

Silhouetted against a moonlit sky, a forest-clad mountain spur outlines the beauty of the famous Cleopatra terrace of the Yellowstone in this midnight picture, which was taken with the aid of a giant flashlight. Union Pacific photo.

R. Rumbel, G.A.R. veteran, considered his uniform of so little importance he sold it for 25 cents at the close of the civil war. Nothing, however, can rob him of his priceless memories of that time, and here we see him telling John Bartson, star scout, some of the tales of that stirring period. Photo by Gatchell.

No doubt, if this daring Italian army officer repeats this hazardous stunt of taking three hurdles at a time in the Olympic meet in Paris, for which he is training near Rome, he will certainly carry off honors, if not the first. P & A photo.

We have the "King Tut Blues," the "King Tut Gown," and the "King Tut Fox Trot," but here's a new one. It's the "King Tut Dive." The lady is Genevieve Young, one of the comely divers at Krug park, who shows how it's done.

Nobility takes to the farm. Viscountess Cobham, breaking loose from tradition and into trade, has started a retail poultry business in Kent, England, at which the younger members of the family assist. The Hon. Meriel Catherine Lyttleton (left), and the Hon. Viola Maud Lyttleton, daughters of the viscountess, are here shown engaged in capturing a calf. P & A photo.

How the Indians used to live in Nebraska. This photograph of Pawnee village (at Genoa, Neb.) was taken 52 years ago by Harry Poston. These mud lodges were made of poles, crutches, willows and slough grass and veneered with mud. The lodges range from 30 to 50 feet in diameter and houses from 10 to 20 persons each. At the time the photograph was taken 2,400 Pawnee Indians lived in this village.

Catherine Horrigan, daughter of Daniel Horrigan, is only 11, but the wedding dress her grandmother wore 80 years ago is a perfect fit. Catherine hopes she won't grow too much so she will be able to wear it at her own wedding when that day arrives. Photo by Dewell.
