Discontinue Service On Early Rail Line

"For the first time in 67 years, since 1868," says the Fremont Tribune, "no passenger trains will operate this month between Fremont and Missouri Valley over the route of the old Sioux City and Pacific railway, now the Missouri Valley branch of the Chicago and Northwestern lines."

The passenger trains, one each way, were removed from the line Feb. 1, ending passenger service on that line which had been continued since the second railroad line was built into Fremont on Feb. 12, 1868, just two years after the Union Pacific entered the town.

The Sioux City and Pacific later became a link in the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley road, which built on to Wisner in 1869 and later pushed on to the northwest reaching the Black Hills.

In the early years trains were ferried across the Missouri river in summer and used temporary bridges in winter.

Increased truck and bus service and the depression are given as the reason for suspending passenger trains on the old line.
