THE NEBRASKA SCENE

Not only this, but railroad rates have been built upon so uncomprehensible a structure that it is cheaper to ship sugar by rail from San Francisco to Chicago and then truck it back to Lincoln than to unload that same sugar in Lincoln as it passes through enroute to Chicago. This applies to other Nebraska towns, as well as to other items.

Presidents Coolidge, Hoover and Roosevelt alike have recognized the isolation and disadvantages of the Missouri valley and have approved for it an outlet to the sea. Economists agree that this section of the country is being held back greatly in the development of industries because of the high transportation rates.

Now the time is rapidly approaching when the Missouri river will be opened for traffic as far as Omaha, and another year or so should see the river barges plying as far north as Sioux City. Kansas City once shipped much grain to the southeast; then Oregon and Washington grain producers, using water transportation thru the Panama canal, took the business away. Last summer, with its new Missouri river barge service, Kansas City flour mills went after the southeastern business again and in five months shipped 3,911 tons of flour to that section of the country.

Proponents of the inland waterways, chief among whom in Nebraska is Former Governor Weaver, say that transportation on established rivers costs from 2 to 3 1/2 mills per ton mile, while the rail rate on class one railroads is 10 mills per ton mile. They say that Nebraska grain growers who shipped via Kansas City and the barge line last year saved 7 cents a bushel over all-rail transportation in getting the grain to the larger milling centers.

Millions of dollars will be saved to Nebraska producers each year, the waterway boosters declare, when the barges run up to Sioux City. In addition they envision increasing prosperity as lower transportation rates enable factories to operate as cheaply here as in the sections where water transportation is already available.

Altho the waterway advocates assure the railroads that they will not be hurt by the cheaper transportation rates, but will share in the greater transportation which will bring business enough to satisfy both the waterways and the land routes, the railroads are fighting the deal to the limit.

The railroads are deeply entrenched in Nebraska and they have enlisted many allies in this state. Big business men who find the railroads profitable to them, are inclined to fight the development of the Missouri as a waterway. Most of the larger chambers of commerce in the state are dominated by railroad allies. Many communities which depend on the railroads for a large share of their tax income and many of whose citizens are employed by the railroads, are fearful of the waterways.

A recent victory for the waterways occurred at Omaha where the clique in command of the chamber of commerce had succeeded in hampering river development. Omaha is a major railroad center, but attempting to head off government competition in a profitable business. A legal authority at the capitol who has been in close contact with Washington in recent weeks, thinks Nebraska's "little TVA" will stand up under test of the high court. "There have been indications," he said, "that the supreme court will not let the new deal down in making the decision on the TVA which is now under consideration. It is pretty well established that the people have a right to use their own natural resources for the public benefit."

The railroads also have a staunch ally in the Lincoln Journal which, incidentally, gets a large share of the printing jobs of "Burlington Lines West."

The economic prognosticators say that the victory in the waterway-railway tussle will go to the medium most fit to do the transportation job. Eventually, they believe, the two mediums will be co-ordinated to the best interests of the state as a whole, but this will mean that the railroads will have to give some ground.

Commentators around the state house see two sides to the recent attack by five privately-owned power companies on Nebraska's three big hydroelectric projects. They say that hooking up of the three projects might be viewed as an invasion of the state's rights, and that it most certainly would cause the private companies financial loss by reducing electric power rates.

On the other hand, the majority of the people probably will not be inclined to shed tears for the private power companies, altho the latter cannot be blamed, perhaps, for
