Man Proposes; Woman—?

being taken for granted, it sprang into being.

My next bridesmaid was Mary. Mary had a quiet, domestic nature, and so had the man of her choice. One Saturday afternoon they started out to visit the Zoo, but on the way she sidetracked him into a famous department store. "How did you get him in there?" I asked, when Mary was telling me about it later. "Well," said Mary, studying the ring on her finger, "I told him I wanted to make a purchase."

It was easy enough to re-construct the scene. After making her purchase Mary led the man of her choice to a model apartment which the store was exhibiting. There was a kitchen, and what man isn't interested in a model kitchen? There was a library. "And he tried a leather chair," reported Mary. "We were all alone. So I handed him a book and asked him if he would like to have his slippers." "And that put the idea in his head?" I remarked. For answer, Mary smiled down at her ring again.

There was a dining room, too. And a charming little boudoir, fit for any bride. "By that time," said Mary, "I was pretending that I was the lady of the house—and I asked him who he was, looking in my boudoir like that. And he said 'Well, I can be the lady's husband; can't I?' But I told him he couldn't, because I had no ring. So then he nearly ran me down to the jewelry department and he wanted to pay a deposit on the model apartment, too, but I stopped him in time. It's too much fun to buy the furniture piece by piece, and I told him so. Catch me buying it wholesale like that!"

FLORENCE is more reticent about how she did it, but she needn't be. It was a perfectly obvious case.

Being an ambitious girl, Florence chose a young man who had fought his way up from nearly nothing. He has hardly started yet, but he has already gone beyond us, and goodness only knows how high he'll climb. He's one of these combative, masterful types of men, and Florence started her campaign by arranging to meet him and then studiously ignoring him. She did it so well that very soon she aroused in him the grim resolve that she should not ignore him! It was in March when Florence began looking over his head as though he simply didn't exist; and it was in June when they were married.

Grace's method was, perhaps, the simplest of all. While walking through a field with the man she wanted, she picked a daisy and began plucking the petals, one by one. "He loves me—He loves me not—" But she kept the result a secret. "What did the daisy say?" asked the man she wanted. "Now you know you don't care!" she told him. Didn't he, though!

Three of my bridesmaids are now thus unaccounted for. Of these three, one is still unmarried, but the other two have both led husbands to the altar. I have not yet learned the details of their engagements, because they have moved away and I've never had a chance for a confidential chat with either of them. But when I do, do you think there's any doubt about what I shall hear?

Shall Woman Propose, indeed! It will be a sorry day if ever she loses the art. I saw in the paper recently that there are eight million unmarried male adults in the United States. Whose fault is it? Why, the fault of the eight million single female adults who ought to have married them! Doesn't every woman know that men are like children and have to be molded to their own good? Very well, then. Man Proposes; Woman—Disposes. And there you are!
