SEA FIGHT A CENTURY AGO

Commodore Decatur's Naval Triumph in the War of 1812.

DESPERATE CLOSE-IN FIGHTING

Youthful Sea Dog Commanding the United States Frigate Tackles British Macedonian and Wins.

One hundred years ago October 25 the United States frigate United States vanquished the British frigate Macedonian in one of those desperate close-quarter battles on the high seas for which the war of 1812 was noted. That victory served further to impress on the world the fact that the young republic was a power to be reckoned with, and also added to the glory of Commodore Stephen Decatur, who as a youngster had gained fame for intrepidity in the days of John Paul Jones.

world is told within an hour or two of the latest move of an army or firing of modern eighteen-inch naval shells, it is hard to realize that the American nation did not learn of the victory of the frigate United States until it had sailed into Newport harbor forty days later, followed by the captured Englishman, manned by a prize crew.

Close Together, Shots Fall Short.
 In October, 1812, the United States, with the frigate President and the Argus, was cruising near Madeira, and on October 22 it parted from those vessels and sailed to the southward for the path of British West Indians, hoping to intercept a merchant ship with a valuable cargo or, better still, encounter a man-of-war.

October 25 in that year fell on Sunday. The United States was in latitude 29 degrees north, longitude 29 degrees 30 minutes west, when the lookout saw a sail to windward. It proved to be the Macedonian, and the American fighter immediately began chase. It soon was certain that the United States would have no difficulty in overtaking the enemy. Both vessels continued on the same tack for half an hour, occasionally exchanging shots, which fell short.

They were so close that the crews of each could hear the cheering of the men aboard the other, but still the fire fell short.

Captain John S. Carden was commanding the Macedonian, and to his initial error in mistaking the character of his pursuer his defeat is largely attributable. Captain Carden believed the United States was the Essex, which carried only carronades, and he suddenly altered his course, squared his yards and crossed the bow of the American, letting drive his forward battery, which did scant damage.

See Dead and Wounded on Deck.
 True, the United States had carronades above, but it also carried a strong battery of large guns on the gun deck, and it was not long before the English commander was apprised of his mistake by their telling fire. He was being cut-to-pieces, so Captain Carden ordered his vessel to bear down on the enemy and try the issue at closer range.

But the terrific fire directed by Commodore Decatur kept the Macedonian from approaching to such close quarters as in the battle only two months before, of the Constitution and the Guerriere, and here again Captain Carden was deceived. So rapid was the work of the American gunners, so swift was their firing and reloading, that the belching of flame and smoke from its sides was incessant, and the British believed the United States was on fire.

Then came a strong wind. It lifted the smoke pall for a moment and the dismayed Englishmen beheld an almost undamaged frigate, with its crew working like mad at the guns, and never a sign of a blaze on board. In return, the Americans saw in those few moments, the effect of their fire. The rigging and spars of the Macedonian were cut to pieces, many guns were dismounted and dead and wounded were scattered about on the decks.

The Macedonian's main yardarm was hanging loose, the main topmast was gone entirely, the fore topmast was tottering and the colors were missing.

Commodore Decatur drew away and came up under the lee of the Macedonian, which fired a feeble broadside. The United States did not respond, but wore in closer until it was so close that Commodore Decatur's voice was heard, saying:

"What ship is that?"
 Captain Carden responded. "His majesty's ship, Macedonian, thirty-eight guns," and then he struck his colors, which had been run up again while the United States was tacking around.

When the prize crew went aboard the Macedonian thirty-six officers and men were found dead and sixty-eight wounded, and more than 100 round shot were found in its hull. The battle had lasted two hours. The United States lost five men killed and six wounded.

As Captain Carden came over the side of the conquering frigate, he proffered his sword, and Commodore Decatur made the reply which added to his reputation among fighting men of nations:

"No, sir, I cannot receive the sword of a man who has so bravely defended his ship; but" he hesitated a moment and smiled—"I will receive your hand."

The Macedonian was comparatively a new frigate, having been built only two years before, and at the time of the battle had been out of dock only four months.

Carries News to Capital.
 Commodore Decatur's men reported that the hull was in fairly seaworthy condition, and he decided to get his prize to an American port. Repairs were made and the return voyage begun, the United States and captured Macedonian entering Newport harbor on December 4. There was great rejoicing there, but in Washington the announcement of the victory was more dramatic.

Commodore Decatur assigned young Midshipman Hamilton to take the captured flag and news of the victory to his father, Paul Hamilton, then secretary of the navy. The young man was four days on the journey to the capital and reached there in the evening. He learned that a state ball was in progress, and, still bearing scars of the battle at sea, and with the British flag draped about his shoulders, he entered the ballroom. Grave heads of government departments, army commanders and, adding to the romance of the affair, Washington's fair social leaders, crowded about him and demanded the news in detail.

Commodore Decatur was hailed as a hero once more in every city of the country and he received the same honor which recently was accorded to the modern naval commander, Rear Admiral Itigo Osterhaus, the freedom of New York City.—New York Herald.

He Wanted His Desert.
 Patrick, lately over in the yards of a railroad. One day he happened to be in the yard office when the force was out. The telephone rang vigorously several times and he at last decided it ought to be answered. He walked over to the instrument, took down the receiver and put his mouth to the transmitter, just as he had seen others do.

"Hello!" he called.

"Hello!" answered the voice at the other end of the line. "Is this eight-six-one-five-nine?"

"Aw, g'wan. Phwat d'ye tink Ol am-a box car?"—San Francisco Star.

Enterprise of the Ancients.
 What interests us most in the news of Prof. Petrie's discovery of an enormous alabaster sphinx, that has lain buried 2500 years in the sands between the Great Pyramids and those of Sakkarah, is not so much its size as its material. According to all accounts, there is not one traced from an immense distance. How? Perhaps this really is the secret of the Sphinx.—Boston Transcript.
