"Talk on Newspaper Advertising"

BY TRUMAN A. DeWEESE, EUFFALO, N. Y.

I have selected this caption because it will attract more attention than if I wrote it "How to Keep a Town Alive." Everybody thinks he knows how to keep a town alive-but how to kill a town-that's another question. The average man wouldn't know exactly how to go about it. "What do I want to kill a town for, anyway!" he would ask.

Towns are an abnormal excrescence on the body politic. Cities and towns are the breeding grounds of vice and crime. They attract all that is ugly and unlovely in communal life. At the same time, they organize and consolidate activities that uplift and refine the race. They present advantages in culture and education which the country cannot supply. While the country gets you close to Nature, it lacks the advantages of big libraries, art galleries, schools and highly organized merchandising. The city is a necessary evil. It is an evolution from the commercial and social necessities of the race. "Therefore," you ask, "What is the use of trying to destroy it?"

No use at all. It is best to keep it alive with honest enterprise, social uplift and religious and educational activity. But it is very easy to kill a town, and when you see how easy it is to kill it you will know how to keep it alive. Here is a woman who gets the "catalogue habit." She falls a victim to the lure of printers' ink. The picture of a rug or piece of furniture looks so much more attractive in the catalogue than it does in the local store in her own town. One of these pictures caught her eye and she sent in an order. It was a novel experience - this shopping by mail. When a neighbor woman called she The news of the "bargain" spread from one home to another until the whole community was infected. There is a strange fascination about "long distance shopping" which no woman wants to enjoy alone. Connections with catalogue houses soon were established by a hundred women. The germ spread with great rapidity and soon put a crimp in the business of every merchant in town. A constant stream of money going out to mail-order houses year after year soon sapped the life blood of the town. And this woman who inoculated here neighbors with the catalogue habit had no thought of killing her town. She wonders why her boys finally left the town and yielded to the lure of the big city and its sky-scraper mail-order houses. Responsibility for the decay of her own community and for the loss of her boys is farthest from her thoughts.

There is just one cure for the catalogue germ that worms its way with serpentine secrecy into the brain of a community-and that is newspaper advertising. Surely the merchant can print just as attractive pictures as the mail-order houses can print in their catalogues. Surely the local merchant can describe his wares just as convincingly as they are described in a catalogue. If he can't he should employ an experta man who can combine the lure of wordcraft with the skill of a salesman. With printers' ink he can pull a town out of the "slough of despond." He can match the personality, acquaintance and reputation of the local merchant against the lure of long-distance shopping. The right kind of newspaper advertising will stop the ravages of the catalogue house and will keep at home the brain and brawn and enterprise that are necessary to keep a town from falling into decay.
