Government Has Plenty Water, but Ditches Are Empty

(From a Staff Correspondent.)

LINCOLN, Neb., July 14.—(Special Telegram.)—Notwithstanding the heavy rainfall in Nebraska this season, State Engineer D. D. Pierce reports that irrigating ditches are running out of water from Kearney west on the North Platte river to the state line. In order to alleviate the condition as much as possible, the state engineer has issued orders for the closing of all ditches except those which come under the head as first appropriations.

Though settlers along the lower Platte are liable to suffer, the government reservoir in Wyoming is better supplied than ever before, and has water to spare, but it wants pay for what it has. It is said that there is sufficient water in the reservoir, 1,088,000 acre-feet, so that the government could let out sufficient to relieve the distress to the settlers below and then have plenty left to keep over for next year.

Hog Cholera Its Prevention and Treatment

THE most complete and practical series of articles ever published on hog cholera has just been completed in the Twentieth Century Farmer. We have taken this matter up in the interests of the farmer and stock raiser. We have put at the head of this investigation a practical man—a man who has had twenty-five years experience in raising hogs and has been a successful competitor for premiums in the state fairs of Nebraska and Iowa, a man who is recognized by the hog raisers of these states as a practical hog man. He has not taken the matter up from the standpoint of the veterinarian, though he has consulted veterinarians in the employ of the government, the colleges and the states, as well as many veterinarians practicing independently among farmers, and has given careful consideration to their opinions. He has not treated the subject from the standpoint of any one farmer, or the farmers of any one locality, nor based his judgment on the experience of men under identical conditions. He has personally interviewed farmers and breeders in three states—Nebraska, Iowa and Kansas.

The writer's years of experience in the hog raising business have enabled him to weigh this great mass of information collected and draw from it conclusions that should be of great value to any man interested in keeping cholera out of his herd or combating it once it gets into his herd, in a rational and practical manner. The writer is not a scientist and has not written a scientific treatise; he discusses this vital subject in the plain, every-day language of the farm and market.

These articles have been so persistently called for that we have collected them into pamphlet form, and this pamphlet is now ready for distribution. We are making a charge of 5c each, to cover postage and handling. If you want one of these bulletins, fill out and send the attached coupon before they are all gone.

Dr. A. T. Kinsley of Kansas City Tells of Need of Inspection. Milk, its importance as a food, the ease with which it can be contaminated, and the necessity of thorough and scientific dairy inspection, were discussed in an interesting manner and illustrated with stereopticon slides by Dr. A. T. Kinsley of Kansas City, at the annual banquet of the veterinarians and their wives, held at Hotel Rome last evening. He is president of the Kansas City Veterinary college and deputy state veterinarian.

Dr. Kinsley declared that 30,000 babies under 1 year old annually die of tuberculosis contracted from milk from cows afflicted with the disease. About 2 per cent of adults who have consumption get it from infected cows' milk, he said, and many other diseases, including rabies, anthrax, cow pox, typhoid fever and sore throat are traceable to milk. About 100,000 babies die every year from the use of putrid milk, he asserted.
