THE success of any automobile organization depends upon scientific manufacturing methods, based upon logical and successful design. There is a certain definite point in production at which is reached the minimum of cost and after which there is no saving in the purchase or manufacture of any larger quantities, whether it be raw steel, magnetos, tires or any other motor car elements.

It is the aim of the Inter-State engineers to build cars in such quantities as will secure the utmost economy, but at the same time permit of that element of personal supervision that distinguishes any highly refined product from the purely mechanical machine work of immense volume. Just as "nature, in her productions slow, aspires by slow degrees to reach perfection's height," so, too, are Inter-State cars, by careful attention to infinite detail, stamped with the perfection of individual refinement.

The factory, itself an example of modern scientific factory construction, is near the center of population of the United States. Here cars are built—not assembled, nor ground out of a hopper—and the constantly growing number of Inter-State owners is evidence of the satisfaction the cars are giving; 30 per cent of the output during this last year was taken by motorists whose preceding Inter-States had rendered satisfactory service.

Inter-State dealers and service stations are located at strategic point all over the country; the name of the factory representative in your locality will be gladly furnished upon request.

But, wherever and under whatever circumstances your Inter-State car is purchased, you may be certain that it is the product of a conscientious, highly developed factory, and that you and your car will always be faithfully served.
