man who views it superficially, making no effort to solve its innumerable riddles. In many of the stanzas he visited Mr. Spens saw things that strongly appealed to his sense of humor and of those things he presents amusing records.

AUCTION HIGHLIGHTS. By Florence Irwin. 27 Pp. $1.25. Putnam's Sons. The book presupposes upon the part of the reader an acquaintance with the elements of auction. It treats, therefore, only of the finer points of play...

FOOT BALL FOR PUBLIC AND PRIVATE. By Herbert Reed. 32 Pp. $1.25. P. A. Stokes Company. This book is written principally to let the spectator and the beginner into the inside. We all enjoy foot ball, but even a cursory reading of the one chapter on how to watch a game will show how little of it most of us understand.

A YEAR WITH A WHALER. By Walter Noble Burns. 250 Pp. $2. Outing Publishing Company. Out of sheer desire to see what it was like Mr. Burns stepped as "greenhorn" on a whaler making the voyage from San Francisco into the Arctic. They walloped through hurricanes, traded with the natives, bumped the Arctic ice floes and fought their share of howlers. It is a story of personal adventure and observation, perhaps a last first-hand glimpse of a dying industry and of the life it entailed on the men who followed it.

OLD FOXY. Edited by James Hinesker. 150 Pp. Theodore Presser Company. A great number and variety of musical subjects are discussed with fine irony, superb denunciation, virile bitterness and magnificent sarcasm by Mr. Hinesker—big pardon, Old Fogy—and there are mingled some fine descriptions of moving events, as of the writing of a symphonic poem, an examination in a college for critics and a piano performance by a wonder child...

Man Trails the Animal. The men who fought the Indians in the early days of the republic and later fought the Indians and British combined have several times recorded their gratitude for that great engineer whose scientific name is Castor canadensis, and whose everyday name is beaver. He was a builder of dams to such excellent purpose, this Castor, that the water of streams was held back, flow of summer streams was checked, and lakes were made of brooks. By means of these works, meager and fluctuating waterways were rendered navigable and troops and supplies were transported quickly and easily. But the beaver's fine coat caused the gratitude toward him to be reduced to an impracticable sentiment. Trappers soon made him a creature rare and futile in this part of the country. His skin became the currency of trade. He was the equivalent of flour and sugar, and calico and powder and lead. In ten years, the two big fur companies of the United States and Canada received 1,570,000 beaver skins, and the "kill" even at this time averages 5,000 per annum. Nevertheless, Castor is regaining some of his lost ground. Because of strict trapping laws, he is multiplying in numbers in the forest and swamp districts to the north of Lake Superior, and in parts of northern Michigan there are thriving families. If hunters will let the beaver alone, or be a little temperate in their shooting, and farmers will not break down his dams, he might come back even to Ohio. Considering the big part the animal has played in winning and settling and bringing material blessings to the middle west, it would be only fair and decent to give him a show if he did decide to return to his own home country.—Toledo Blade.
