THE AMATEUR'S SMALL FRUIT GARDEN

the old branches should be cut out after they have borne four years. When a plantation has been established, several branches may be cut out each season and as many new ones allowed to grow. In that way, the bushes will be constantly renewed and there will be no lack of fruit. The plants should stand about four feet apart when they are set out, and kept thinned so that they will not crowd as they grow older. A shovelful of manure around each currant bush in the fall will be a help, if the manure is forked into the soil in the spring.

GRAPES FOR YOUR OWN EATING:

Grapes are among the most obliging of small fruits. They are very easy to grow, occupy but little room and can be trained over the side of a barn or a fence as well as on a trellis or arbor. They are ornamental, too, and make an excellent screen. On a small place, it is possible to have grapes growing all along the fences and clambering over the buildings, yielding a very large amount of fruit without trespassing at all on ground needed for general purposes. If one has an inexpensive fruit press, it becomes a very simple matter to make good grape juice, and it is but little more trouble to make wine.

Grapes have a preference for sunny locations and rather rich, loose soil. An ideal place for them is the south side of a building, where they will be sheltered from cold winds. They will thrive in the rich soil of a poultry yard, and provide needed shade for the fowls. Train them high, however; chickens have a weakness for grapes.

It is best to plant grape vines at least ten feet apart in the home garden and to cover the roots with six inches of soil, well tramped down. At planting time the vines should be cut back to three or four buds; and pruning will be needed every winter, before warm weather starts the sap flowing. If the work is left until late, the vines will bleed. Even so, some spring trimming of the smaller branches may be needed, if the growth is very heavy. It is a great mistake, though, to remove the leaves. Many amateurs think that the fruit should be exposed to the sun, but this is all wrong. Pinching off the ends of the branches will help to give larger fruit and often it pays to thin the bunches if one wants grapes of quality. Grow Concord, but have other kinds, also.

ROSES FOR THE AMATEUR

abundance of sunlight during all or the greater part of the day. Keep away from large trees and shrubs; the roots of which will rob them of their nourishment.

Roses will succeed in any good fertile soil where there is no excess of moisture. If wet, provide artificial drainage, which can be most efficiently done by digging your beds out to a depth of from two to two and a half feet, filling in with stone or rubble to within eighteen inches of the surface, then filling up with good top soil, incorporating a liberal amount of well-decayed cow-manure; if the soil is sandy, the mixing in of stiff loam or clay soil will be an advantage.

Throughout the summer, the surface of the soil should be stirred at least once every week. If this is followed up closely, watering will rarely be necessary.

GARDEN WRINKLES

DO YOU desire a long season of lilies of the valley? Then, plant clumps on each of the four sides of the house and your desire will be gratified in a very simple fashion. Those on the south side will bloom first. The others will come along in succession as the weather warms up, those on the north side flowering last.

Mignonette makes an excellent house plant, if seeds are sown in pots late in the summer.
