

RELIEF STATION BUSY PLACE

T. P. Redmond Gives Way Under Diet of Cold Corned Beef.

NEIGHBORS COME TO THE FORE

One Woman Serves the Workers with Oyster Sandwichs, Another Provides Sandwiches and Warm Pies.

With Manager T. P. Redmond of relief station No. 4 already temporarily knocked out by hard, long hours of work and cold grub, relief came to the relievers at that station when Mrs. John Daily, living just north of the relief station, began making oyster stews and inviting the relief workers in at noon. In platoons of three they drilled up the steps of her front porch, filled around the table in perfect order and fell to. It was about the first hot meal any of them had experienced since they began the relief work.

Some kind follow from across the street had been bringing in coffee, but aside from that this heroism came from the busiest station in the field toiled faithfully on, meanwhile snatching bits of cold corned beef and crackers to keep fish and bones in working order that they might be constantly on the job to dish out boxes of relief supplies to those who called in an incessant stream.

T. P. Redmond has been unable to be at the post for a day now, and his indisposition is attributed to the strain of day and night work and cold meals of corned beef, always corned beef. No one complained. No one even took time to remark how nice it would be to run home and get a square meal. Still it never rains but it pours, for hardly had the dozen workers been well-filled with the rich, hot oyster stew at noon, than in walked Mrs. Wright, who lived a half block away, carrying a half dozen hot pies and two crooks of sandwiches. The coffee came too, so there was no dearth of staples.

Clothes for Fat People. Clothes for fat people for real fat people, are in great demand at this station. "Why?" Well, there is no telling. It just simply happens that half the people who have applied for clothing at this station are large, very large, obese.

"Oh, these No. 4 women," cried one of the women working at the station after she had just finished furnishing coats and skirts to three of them. She started to tell about a fat bachelor who called for a suit of underwear, how the house was searched high and low for a union suit that would fit him. She had just come to the point of describing how pleased he looked and how he laughed when he was fitted out, but someone told her of the oyster stew waiting for her down the hill and she swung into the ranks of the little platoon and marched to the oysters.

Keeps His Identity. At No. 4 wagons are coming and going bringing supplies from the Auditorium and taking them away to those needing relief. Nor do all things come from the central station at the Auditorium. A skinny horse harnessed to a rickety spring wagon stopped in front of the station. An aged man wearing only carpet slippers, his shoes having blown away with the tornado, was holding the lines. "I brought some potatoes," he said. "I can't give very much as I was practically wiped out myself, but I want to leave these potatoes." Thereupon he unloaded five sacks of potatoes at the station and drove away like many another chertu giver who has not even taken pains to reveal his identity.

Besides the boxes of groceries that should last an ordinary family two weeks, kitchen outfits are being given out from this station. They consist of two tin tubs, a wash boiler, a washboard, three irons, a dish pan, a tea-kettle, a wash basin, a frying pan two bread pans, two pie pans, three stew pans, a butcher knife and many other little things that make up the immediate necessities of the kitchen.

Capt. Stritzinger Fires Two Working at the Auditorium

Even as being a stranger in a city with no visible means of support makes one a hobo, so getting drunk without any visible means of buying the Jule makes Captain Stritzinger suspicious, so suspicious that he fired one of the assistant cooks at the relief kitchen at the Auditorium when he came in pickled. Captain Stritzinger knew that the fellow had no money when he took the job. He knew that he had not yet been paid for his services. Consequently when he came in under the influence of booze the captain decided he was a good fellow to do without. So the kitchen has done without him since.

Also when a colored helper at the Auditorium was found upstairs toasting shoes and other good articles of clothing down into the alley with a view to slipping around afterward and picking them up he was nabbed by the collar and hustled to the city jail. The Auditorium force knew the man only by the name of Henry.

Well, Henry should have been on the payroll, but when last Saturday night came Henry found he was not on the payroll. Henry knew this and he knew that the matter would be eventually straightened out. But he took no chances. He slipped upstairs and began to leave shoes overboard.

These are the kind of things we have tried to guard against from the first," said Captain Stritzinger, "and we decided to nip them in the bud right from the start. Aside from those two cases, however, we have had no cases of improper or irregular work reported to us here."

Firms Give Part of Saturday Receipts to Ralston Relief

Ralston was the only town in Nebraska devoted exclusively to manufacturing, and when on March 25, 1913, every manufacturing plant and business house of this place was leveled to the ground by the destructive tornado that swept the residence district of Omaha its people were the hardest hit of any town in the cyclone district.

If the homes had been blown away and the payroll could have continued the people in time could have rebuilt their own homes, but the business interests being entirely wiped out and all visible means of support taken away it leaves its inhabitants in a serious condition. The undersigned firms agree to donate for Ralston's relief and restoration the percentage set opposite their names of all their cash sales on April 5:
