guarded by two policemen. Before reaching the frontier, he made one of the most during escapes in criminal history. With his hand-cuffed fists he bent down he guards, opened the door of the rail-way carriage and threw himself out into way carriage and threw himself out into the night while the train was running at full speed. And he was not caught. In some way he reached Anchen, where he met Mathilde. The next day he was in Paris, with the change out of the hundred frames she had given him. He took a cab and drove direct to the Ministry of War, and offered his services. He was received by Captain Francois and Captain Mareschal (then in charge of the Service of Information) and, with the approval of the General Staff, was formally registered as a French spy.

Captain Francois (from whom I have these facts) "that Germany will try and extradite me from France as she did from Germany.

"And the Captain Mareschal answered: "You may be perfectly tranquil! France, after all you have done for her, will not let you be extradited." They were at ease—the spy and the captains in charge of the Service of In-rmation. And Wessel said: "Of course, I can And Wessel said; "Of course, I can not serve you directly, for I can not re-enter my country, but there is a man at Nice who can give you all the information you need. Besides he has lost all his money at Monte Carlo,"

So with 5,000 francs in his pocket he went to Nice, where Mathilde joined him. Together they pulled down one of the highest functionaries in the German government. That may betrayed of the highest functionaries in the Ger-man government. That may betrayed the plans of mobilization, so far as they concerned the railways, for the entire German empire. The amount he re-ceived was less than 100,000 frames. With that money he returned to the tables at Monte Carlo, lost again, and killed himself. He was a man of fam-ily and position, he was nearly sixty years of age—but he had met Ma-thilde and Wessel and his life of work and honor fell apart like a honse of and honor fell apart like a house of cards.

This was the first big success of the new partnership of Wessel and Mathilde; on the strength of it they got married. And the idyll might have lasted had not Mathilde loved opals and Wessel been

They had to go back to work.

W ESSEL was kept in Nice and Monte W Carlo, where he was useful. At times he was sent to Navey, near the German frontier, or to Brussels — for French in frontier, or to Brussels—for French in fluence had arranged that matter of extradition. Mathide was given a more difficult task. In her extremity she had retired to the "clearing-house" in Brussels. The discredited Cuers had been successed by Thiessen, that wonderful spy who had so successfully corrupted Eusign Ullmo, the young naval officer of Toulon, who is now expiating his particular treason on Devil's Island. Like all the chief agents of treason who Like all the chief agents of treason who make their beadquarters in Brussels, in Brussels, Thiesen worked indifferently for any country — and betrayed each in turn He had then work to do for Germany Russian frontier. He selected Mathilde.

Mathilde.

A Russian general (in the civil branch of the service) Przyborowski was at Monte-Carlo that season. In a week Mathilde met him; in a month she had rained him financially; in two months she had ruined him morally. He promised her he would betray his country—as completely as he could; but first he must go back to Russia. With that dread of the Red Czar's land which seems to be embedded in the natures of these women—ineradicable, like a triangle in a circle—she refused to cross the frontier. She took refuge in Koemigsburg, where once she had been a little girl, going to school. And Przyborowski smuggled across the frontier to her documents of importance, while Thiesen clamoured for more—then, too, the Russian insisted she should come to Wilna to meet him. He tempted her—this opal temptress—with words of love and of trepson. And she went. He kissed her when he met her; and then he threw her across the frontier into the lists and of treason.
