

does not matter, they do not care. When they are dead will others not be ready to occupy their places? They do not stop to train them—they are already trained.

Whose hand is instrument in all this training? A woman's. And truly, her cunning is equalled by none. Then let every true and loyal American woman guard her liberty with a jealous eye and train her children to love God and the right.

We may not reap the harvest in our short lives but there are those who come after us to fill our places, and our hands must be the hands to lead them and our lips the lips to teach them. O, what a power a woman may be through a husband or son!

Mothers, women, live your honors. Let your banner be unfurled! For the hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world.

MALICE OF ROME.

An Example Given Nearly Twenty-Two Years Ago.

The following from Harper's Weekly, April 13, 1872, will be found interesting at this time:

That cruel and murderous spirit, a trait of the dangerous classes who are found in the most Romish countries, has received a new exemplification in a probably fatal assault upon a teacher in Pennsylvania. Nothing so frightful in religion has occurred recently. In Italy and even Spain the hand of the Romish assassin has been stayed; it is left for America to offer the worst examples of papal cruelty and intolerance, and to witness patiently outrages that in Rome or Vienna would meet with instant and terrible retribution. In the town of Centralia, Pennsylvania, E. C. Greene, a teacher generally esteemed and of superior ability, is at the head of one of the public schools. He happened, in private consultation, to reply vigorously to a Romish acquaintance who argued against Protestantism, and had treated it with ill-reverence. The conversation was reported to the priest; the next Sunday the Romish children were forbidden to attend the school; an effort was soon after made to remove Greene from his position; when the school board refused to consent, the Roman Catholics formed a plot to murder him. Since the death of Jean Calas, at Toulouse, indeed no act of religious violence has surpassed in cold, vindictive malice this dreadful scene enacted in a small town of Pennsylvania, under the protection of American law.

One morning the teacher—and it was but a few days ago—entered his school. He found sitting there three men whom he did not know, and one pupil, a Miss Strauser. The strangers had inquired for Mr. Greene of the young girl and were waiting for him. She saw them enter into conversation with him, but as he bent down over the stove to open the door, one of the men struck him a severe blow with a sling shot. She now strove to escape, but a ruffian seized her and threatened to shoot her if she dared to give the alarm. With what terror and confusion we may well imagine, Miss Strauser was forced to look on while the assassins beat the teacher until they thought him dead, and then cut off one of his ears. They made their escape, and although several persons have been arrested and taken before Miss Strauser, she has not been able to identify any one of them. It is possible that horror and alarm may have confused her senses. Meantime Mr. Greene lies in a dying condition. After his terrible wounds he contrived to get up, walk out of the school house, and was found lying upon the earth bleeding and insensible. His head is severely cut, his skull fractured in two places, one ear entirely gone, and his mind has not sufficiently returned to enable him to relate the particulars of the assault, or describe the persons who attacked him.

That a citizen holding one of the most respectable and useful stations in the community, the head of a public school, should be set upon by assassins because he spoke openly in defense of his religion, is a circumstance in itself sufficiently shocking. No one's life or person, it seems, is any longer safe who ventures to doubt the divinity of Mary or the supreme prerogatives of the pope. He is liable to have his skull fractured, his ears cut off, to be exposed without protection to the utmost malice of that large criminal population that seems to grow up naturally under the shelter of the Romish church. Statistics show that more than three fourths of our criminals and paupers are Roman Catholics. In the city of Rome, under the papal rule, the number of murders and assassinations is infinitely greater than in any other city. But the circumstances attending the assault upon Mr. Greene serve to render it singularly alarming. For some time before it occurred the town of Centralia had been filled by the Romish priests and their adherents with pamphlets denouncing the public schools. The Romish population had been excited to intense fanaticism. The priest aided in encouraging the dangerous spirit of the people, and the assassins seem to have been urged on to their dreadful deed by the open countenance of the Romish church; nor have priests or people repented of their crime even in the presence of their dying victim. It is stated that many Roman Catholics exult over his fate, and declare he shall never be allowed to leave the town alive. Several Protestants who expressed their sympathy for the teacher have been threatened with violence, and are now removing from Centralia with their families, lest they, too, may be assaulted, maimed or murdered.

What patriotic American can hear without shame and indignation this last outrage of the Romish population? Is freedom of speech no longer to be known among us? Is the press to be silenced by the worst elements of society? Shall a foreign sect be permitted to encourage in our midst murders and assassinations? A feeble effort has been made in a Roman Catholic periodical to remove from its people the odium of a long series of acts of violence fatal to the peace of a community by asserting that other sects are equally guilty with its own. But this assertion is plainly untrue. No other religious sect assaults teachers as at Hunter's Point, or leaves them bleeding and dying as in the school house at Centralia. A Romish mob struck down with fearful wounds an ardent preacher at Ogdensburg, and another at Scranton. Three times have the streets of New York been filled with bloodshed and terror by the religious bigotry of its Romish population. The Romish press, on several occasions before the fall of the priestly rule in our city, strove to excite its people to assault publishers and authors who ventured to denounce the fatal spread of Romish influence, the corruption and degradation of Romish officials; nor is there any part of the country that does not abound in constant proofs of the malice and cruelty that prevail unrestrained amidst the ignorant members of that sect which alone opposes the education of the people. It is the bigotry of ignorance and selfish isolation that has made our Romish population the source of political tumults, of private assassinations, of unbounded pauperism and crime. It is at the direct command of an Italian priest that they are taught to hate the teacher and the public school, to separate themselves from their fellow citizens in the slob and pride of a barbarous degradation, to create in our midst a mental China or Japan, and fill the cities of the new world with the cruelty and vice that have just been expelled from the capitol of Europe.

Accomplished, intelligent, respected by the good and wise, Mr. E. C. Greene has fallen a victim to the malice of a foreign sect and Italian priests. If he recovers, he will always bear with him the marks of the persecutor's hand; if he dies, his death will call down a bitter retribution upon the priests and the people who have plotted his destruction. Will any patriotic American rest for a moment while his great crime goes unpunished—the martyr to his faith is dead, and his assassins are hidden by the sympathy of his religious opponents? Nothing but the most rigorous inquiry, the most decided punishment, will satisfy the indignation of the people. It is a case in which every citizen should interest himself, since it involves the welfare of all. It differs from every common assassination, since it is the most fearful of a long series of acts of sectarian bigotry, of papal assaults upon the free school and the freedom of the intellect. Let every patriotic American aid in enforcing the rigors of the law; let the common voice of the country put an end at once to this reign of terror which the foreign priests would establish among us, and the wounds of the martyred teacher at Centralia will not have cried out in vain.

ARE THEY MURDERERS?

Rumors That Count Creighton and Charlie Kosters

Are, in a Measure, Responsible for the Death of John W. Honza, a Member of the G. A. R. of Omaha.

Immediately upon the announcement of the death of John W. Honza, rumors of the most startling nature were flying, and were in nearly everybody's mouth. Mr. Honza was an old resident of Omaha, with a large circle of friends, and when these rumors became common talk, some of his friends asked us to make an investigation and publish what we found to be the truth.

The rumors, briefly stated, were that John Honza had been in a saloon on Fifteenth street, where he was assaulted by Charlie Kosters and Count John A. Creighton, two drunken, dissolute characters who have been in numerous scrapes before, and that the injuries he had received at their hands had been the primary cause of his death, although the physician attending him assigned other causes.

We started out immediately to gather testimony, and soon had sufficient to warrant us in saying that there was at least some ground for the rumors.

We found a man who had been in Ed. Maurer's place in the forenoon of the day Honza was assaulted in the Fifteenth street dispensary, who said Count Creighton, of the holy Roman church, and Charlie Kosters, of the same hellish institution, together with Bob Holmes and a county official who was not elected by the A. P. A., were in there drinking; that they became extremely boisterous, and used vile, obscene language to designate the members of the A. P. A., Orange Institute and kindred organizations.

They finally left Maurer's place and started up the street. When they got to Fifteenth they turned into Godley Brucker's place, where they proceeded to bowl up and apply the most villainous epithets to Protestants whom they suspected of being members of the A. P. A., or in sympathy with that organization.

Creighton, who has recently been made a count of the holy Roman empire by the pope of Rome—as is his custom when drunk—and that is about all the time—was extremely vicious in his utterances, while Kosters, who is a noted bully and all-around tough, stood ready to do the fighting.

Finally they became personal in their remarks, and a young Swede who happened to be in the saloon playing a game of high five took up what was said, and told Kosters that he was "nothing but a murderer," for which he was assaulted.

Some of the witnesses say that Honza then made a remark about the cowardice of a man who would strike as small a man as the Swede, and proceeded to stand up for the A. P. A., although not a member of the organization himself. It is said that Count Creighton demanded of Honza that he get down on his knees and beg their pardon for what he had said; but Honza having served his country in the late war, and carrying scars and wounds inflicted by the enemy, had not yet learned that the pope's subjects could cause the unwilling hinges of his knees to bend to them. A second time he was ordered to get down on his knees and beg their pardon or they would knock him down, but again he refused, and Kosters struck him a vicious blow in the head.

Another bunch of witnesses say that Honza, Creighton and Kosters were in a wine room, that Kosters knocked Honza across a table, and pounded him in the neck and on the body while he was down, while the count egged him on.

This much is true, Honza, Creighton and Kosters were in Brucker's, Kosters and Creighton were drunk and quarrelsome and were looking for trouble. Kosters struck Honza, who took to his bed and died. Before death came to his relief he complained that his body hurt him, which would indicate that the testimony of the witnesses who claim the assault took place in the wine room and in the manner described is the most reliable.

If Honza died from the effects of the assault made on him by Kosters it probably adds a second victim to the brutal instincts of that young tough, for in 1882 he narrowly escaped the hangman's noose for the murder of a bartender named Hammer. Some of the old settlers say he escaped the scaffold simply because the main witnesses were run out of the country; but be that as it may he still lives and disgraces the estimable family of which he is a member.

It seems to us that it was the duty of the coroner, when rumors were rife, to hold an inquest over the body of John W. Honza, and decide whether or not Count Creighton and Charlie Kosters were responsible for his death.

If Honza died from injuries inflicted by those two drunken ruffians, they should have been arrested, tried and convicted, and hanged by the neck until they were dead.

They are a disgrace to this city, and while Count Creighton is probably the richest man in Omaha, he is at the same time one of the most vicious and depraved creatures God ever placed the breath of life in.

The Pope Against the Pope.

A Chinese puzzle compared with the pope's deliverance is a simple contrivance. He does not seem to think it necessary to be consistent or to avoid contradicting himself. In his recent encyclical letter, upon which we commented at the time of its appearance, his holiness did not think that the relation between church and state in this country was by any means ideal. He went so far as to suggest that "the church would bring forth more abundant fruits, if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of public authority."

This bold declaration is in perfect harmony with the historic character of Romanism. It is one of the fundamental principles of the Roman Catholic faith. No one acquainted with the history and the teachings of Rome was at all surprised at the pope's suggestion. But his followers and his sympathizers are able to explain away this bold bid for American aid. Those who take the pope at his word are declared lunatics and fanatics. We are perfectly certain that the pope's meaning would be explained in some way or other, Rome never retracts; she shifts her policy, but goes on sublimely ignoring her inconsistencies.

Last week the secular press gave publicity to an interview which an American citizen had with the pope on the subject of church and state. In that pretended interview the pope gave utterance to sentiments in exact harmony with our doctrine of the separation of civil and religious affairs. No Methodist or Presbyterian could outdo the pope in his admiration of the workings of our system. His eminence is reputed to have said to General Batchelor of New York:

"I do not seek to meddle with governments, except to admonish my people to obey the civil law and to conform to the authority of the land in which they dwell. I sent a legate to America in order that I might be better informed as to the character of American institutions and their peculiarities, and above all to reconcile any conflict, if there should be any, between the government of my church and the government of the land. I consider America essentially a christian country. Religion is free. The government does not aid nor does it oppose the labors of the church. I am free to say that the further I study the conditions of this, the more it commends itself to my judgment. If a religion cannot thrive on its own merits then it must stagnate or fall. I tell my people to convert Americans to the faith by proving to them by pious and orderly living, and by precept and example that it is the true religion; not to seek converts except through means recognized by the laws of the country, and the principles of humane and divine economy."

How does this tally with the pope's official utterances? He is infallible when he speaks ex cathedra. Of course his labored encyclical letter was authoritative. His interview with General Batchelor was informal and, therefore, fallible to error. Our readers can choose between the pope infallible and the pope unofficial. But when shall we ever be done with this everlasting lying and intriguing? The plain, honest people would have a thousand times more respect for the pope and his supporters if they would just make a fearless declaration of their position and then fight for it. This shifting the sails to catch every breeze is so repulsive to common honesty that no true man can have any patience with a church that practices it.—St. Louis Observer.

The Bible and the Roman Catholics.

Nowhere do we find the Bible in daily use among Roman Catholics. If you tell a papist that they are forbidden the use of that sacred book, he will deny the soft impeachment—he will tell you that Roman Catholics are allowed to buy, keep, and read the Bible, and will actually show you copies of it in their houses. But if you investigate fully, you will ascertain that the owners of these Bibles hold them under such conditions that they scarcely dare to read a line in them.

It is true that the hierarchy does teach that every word in the Bible is the infallible word of God; but they go one step further, and teach that it is so sacred that none but those in holy orders can properly understand it, and that it is, consequently, very dangerous for laymen to read it; and to show how dangerous it is in the hands of laymen, they give instances, whether real or fictitious, where laymen have deduced false notions from such readings, resulting in great mischief. For instance, a layman, having read how Abraham was commanded to sacrifice his son on a burning altar, went and killed his own son as an acceptable sacrifice to God! Besides, if any layman should imbibe erroneous notions from such reading it might cause the loss of his soul!

Hence, while the use of the Bible is not absolutely forbidden, it is so hedged around so as to make it practically impossible for them to read it. In the first place only such copies as are endorsed by the bishops may be read at all; then, only very large and expensive Bibles are ever endorsed by the bishops, and, consequently, only men of means purchase. Finally, after a Catholic has one of these precious volumes, he must not read it till the bishop has blessed it, which may never take place! If, at length, sometime, the blessing should be given, (the price being first paid,) then the happy owner of the book is allowed to read it; but he is cautioned not to form any opinion on anything he reads therein; because he might form an erroneous opinion that would cause the loss of his soul!

Now who cares to read any book under such conditions? It is easy to see that practically all lay Catholics are forbidden to read the Bible; and I have not one of them that had ever read any portion of it carefully. If you know of any Romanists who has a Bible you will find he has a very large and expensive copy, which he keeps carefully hid away under lock and key, or as an ornament on the center table under a glass case.

In next week's issue we will print an article on this subject from the pen of A. Lambert, a very learned Roman Catholic priest, who has recently read the Bible, and has come out of popery, and become a christian.

Beware of Them.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 25, 1895.—MR. EDITOR: The dago American pope, Satoli, and the most expert Jesuits of long experience from Europe, Mexico and South America, are now in the United States, plotting with the hierarchy to break up the government. Nearly all the incendiaries, murderers and robbers, bank burglars, stage and express train thieves are protected by the hierarchy. As long as they are allowed the same privileges as good, honest and industrious patriots, just so long there will be trouble. If we desire to see our country prosper as it has done in the past, regardless of sacrifice, this entire army of the devil must be compelled to leave the United States of America. If other countries could not and would not have this poisonous and corrupt elements among them, shall Americans permit it? The sooner they are fired out of the country the better. Americans, beware of the Paulist fathers. What a deceptive name! They are wolves in sheep's clothing, and the pioneer regiment of the pope's army. These infernal reptiles have overawed our courts. Judges and jurors are afraid of their lives if they should deal out justice to criminals. Many of our constables and police are of the sort who say, "the church first, and then the country." This class assist the criminal to escape justice. JUSTICE.
