As a consequence, the longevity of the inhabitants is probably much greater than in any other portion of the globe. In spite of all this and the proximity of the island to the Cape, hardly a solitary Africander finds his way there from one year's end to the

The Roentgen Rays.

The electrical ether waves, which Herz and others have experimented with, are, as a rule, too large to de compose the salts of a photographic plate, but they can traverse opaque substances, such as the human body, the eye, they are also too large to irritate the nerves. Roentgen and others have demonstrated, however, that certain of these electric rays or wave motions can affect the seasitive film indirectly by exciting phosphorescence in bodies on which they fall. Hence the Roentgen silhouettes and the cryptoscope of Salvioni are already familiar to the readers of this column.-London Globe.
