If the sid navel office, a who framed the department rules were ever to hear or the was so which a cortain mexico of them was put some time ago I am afraid that their westthe would for all time haunt one young man who naw holds a licetokant's commission. his was the way in which Liententhe W. J. Wilson, in charge of the suverement bydrographic office, began shorr the other day white seated mone a number of naval reserves who and just returned from the war. "The Bloor's name was Cleary," continued Lieutenant Wilson. "The confession of his perversion of the rules came out during the examinations for entrance to the navy which were held in Washington early in the war, Cleary was an Annapolis man, who, upon his graduation, drew a cadetahip aboard one of the small unprotected cruisers. He served for a time, but fere with her enthusiasm at the chase the dull life of those piping times of peace and the emaliness of the pay drave him to resign from the service and to accept a position as first mate of an ore carrier on the lakes. For a time he was satisfied, but the beginning of the war, with its call for men, saw Cleary in Washington on the still hunt for a commission. He was told that be would have to stand an examination, but this was no bugbear to him, for if there ever was a man at the academy who was strong on the mental tests it was this same Cleary. The old retired officers who were giving the mental tests fired question after question at Cleary, but he answered them as promptly and as accurately as if he had just come from a classroom. Finally he was asked what he would do if he were the master of a ship and the ery of 'man overboard' were to be given. Cleary told them just what he would do, and, if anything, the answer was better than the one given in the manual. This led one of the examiners to say, 'Why, Mr. Cleary, that is really very good! What kind of service have you been in that you have such opportunities for using these rules for navigation?' And Cleary replied: Well, I always did like that section of the rules when I was studying in the academy and some way or other it clung to me. One day last summer, during one of the hottest days I ever saw, the freighter on which I was serving was on Lake Superior. Suddenly there came a cry of 'man overboard, and looking over the rail I saw that our last keg of beer had accidentally sone into the lake. Gentlemen, that last keg of beer was of more value to us than some of the lives on board and we had to save it.' Cleary drew a senlor lieutenant's commission."

With new economic ideas, with an ever-increasing development of her natural resources, with a more flexible industrial system, a more rational attitude toward manual labor, and more go over the plush to prevent that from enlightened methods of public education, there has come a literary inspiration impossible before, and the year 1870 has more than made amends for the year 1830, says the Suwance Re-The words which Sidney Lanier wrote to his wife in 1870 may be taken as reflecting the new energies of the time: "Day by day . . . a thousand vital elements rill through my Day by day the secret deep forces gather which will presently display themselves in bending leaf and waxy petal and in useful fruit and Hardly were these words written before Irwin Russell opened a new province to American literature by his skillful delineations of negro character. Two years later Maurice Thompson is hailed by Longfellow as "a new and original singer, fresh, joyous and true." In 1875 Sidney Lanier attains national fame by his poem on "Corn" and the six years of life that remained to him were to be filled with bursts of imperishable song. In 1876 Joel Chandler Harris annexed the province which Irwin Russell had discovered, and "Uncle Remus" quietly assumed a place in the world's literature of humor and folk-lore never filled until then. Two years inter Miss Murfree, better known as Charles Egbert Craddock, set all the magazine readers wondering at the genius that could find literary material in the illiterate mountaineers of East Tennessee. The decade closed with the appearance in literature of George W. Cable, whose "Grandissimes" is ranked by not a few erities as second only to the "Scarlet The next decade witnessed the advent of Thomas Nelson Page of Virginia and James Lane Allen of Kentucky, Mr. Page's "Marse Chan" and "Meh Lady" not only presented the relation of master and slave in a new light, but furnished at the same time expose of the latent, though perhaps unintentional, injustice of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The historical value, to the south of stories like these, to say nothing of their literary charm, cannot be easily overrated. Mr. Allen, in his "Blue-Grass Region of Kentucky," added another state to the southern literary union, and spread a charm of a storied past over a region that had long ago led Henry Ward Beecher

Miss Asenath Harper is "getting along in years," a fact which she is unwilling to accept. She wears very youthful clothes; in fact, she has been described by a waggish neighbor as "sheep dressed lamb-fashion." And sometimes when the world pushes her into the niche where it thinks she belongs, Miss Asenath rebels. One day she was talking merrily with a party of young girls. Her cheeks were pink and her little curls fluttering. She laughed a great deal. "O Miss Asenath," at last exclaimed one of the girls, innocently, "how gay you must have been!" "Have been! Well, I'd have you know I'm not a centurion yet!"

The Prince of Wales has officiated seventy-five times as godfather. The emperor of Germany stands godfather to all seventh sons in Prussia.
