-----HANDMAIDEN OF ART. ------

'The ladies of the board found time n the midst of many other duties to give extravagent praise to poor old annie Lee's wash drawings. Indeed, it was the ladies of the board who had provided the materials for these productions. Though they were an enthusiastic board, they admitted to themselves that time might sometimes hang a little heavy at the Old Ladies' Home—that peaceful retreat of decayed gentlewomen. For, be it understood, this was a retreat of a peculiar sort, and was not too inclusive in its beneficence. The ladies who filled its bare, clean chambers were be widows of elergymen, the cousing of bishops, the near kin of deans. An atmosphere at once exclusive and theological pervaded the place, and if law and system have one spot which they favored above all others, that place was, without doubt, the Annie Lee was as well born as any amate of its walls, and she treasured certain reminiscences of a peculiarly feminine character which might have furnished a romancer with several pretty tales. She had not, however, known in the long course of her life what it was to draw the deep and sweet breath of perfect liberty. As a girl she was raised to account for every moment of her time, and to ask for permission to make a call or to take a walk. It had always been the fashion in her family for the women to do this way. an expressman shall bring your things afterward." But old Annie was not to be so easily enjoied. It was only after the perplexed young lady resorted to threats that the artist consented to resign her independent career.

But Mrs. Appleby had yet further difficulties to encounter. The president of the board and all the mem bers refused to take the poor old renture back.

"She has proved herself ungrate-ful," said they. She does not de-serve to enjoy the privileges of the

"I do not think she will ever try to be free again. She knows now for such as she it is useless. She has no friends to care for her. Let her come back to her corner-she has been a naughty old but she will be good now, and perhaps love us all the better. Please!"

But the board was obdurate for a long time, and finally consented to permit Annie's return only on condition that she would make an apology. This Annie flatly and persistently refused to do.

"What have I to apologize for?" she inquired. "Is the home a prison and are the members of the board my jailers? Who are they, pray, that Annie Lee should apologize to them? She bore herself with the greatest But after these brave words she broke
