DAZZY DAZZLES; HUGGINS GROANS

This story concerning Dazzy Vance involves the sad heart of Miller Huggins, one very torn and very dirty flannel shirt a reformed wild man and the most spectacular slinging performance of 1923.

Quite a few moons ago, Dazzy who was nicknamed Arthur at the baptismal font, but who promptly put "Arthur" into cold storage, pitched such neat and nifty baseball in the minor league circuits that the Yankees gathered him unto themselves and Huggins spoke to Dazzy thus: "Hey, kid, go out and have a few and lemme see what you can do."

Dazzy, nervous, dazzy, victimized by stage fright, heaved as per orders and in the general direction of the plate. But he came within an inch of beaming a cash customer in the upper tier of the grandstand with the debutting toss. Dazzy slung again and the ball nearly knocked the hair off the wife of the aforementioned cash customer, who was sitting by his side.

"Get thee hence before you kill enough folks to get yourself electrocuted six different times in Sing Sing prison," gurgled Huggins.

That was in 1920. Dazzy loped off to New Orleans, hired out his tall and angular self, devoted every thought and all his energy towards acquisition of control—and then was speared by the Brooklyn Dodgers in the spring-time of 1922.

Vance showed promise last year—just promise. And then came the shirt incident which transformed his life.

Rather early in this gentle spring-time Dazzy discovered one day that his laundry hadn't come back to him, that it was his turn to throw base balls at the opposition and he had no shirt to cover his form except an old flannel affair, with torn sleeves, which he had worn in the Southern league and discarded when he graduated into swagger major league circles.

There being nothing else to wear, Dazzy wore that one; and he won the combat.

The next time he was ordered to perform mound chores, he again donned the shirt—and again did he win.

"Ha," quoth Dazzy, "can this be a lucky shirt?" It was—for Dazzy. But not for the opposition. The enemy batsmen eventually began to yip to the umpires about the shirt. They claimed that the torn sleeves, flapping in the ozone as Dazzy whirled his salary flipper, were most disconcerting—and likewise an unethical procedure. They wanted the arbitrators to rule that Dazzy must wear a nice clean flannel shirt—with untorn sleeves.

But Dazzy, having won six or seven straight combats by that time, howled in rebuttal. He insisted that although there might be something unsanitary there was nothing illegal about a dirty shirt with torn sleeves. The umpires deliberated in solemn fashion—and agreed with him.

And so Dazzy Vance, pitching for one of the weakest clubs in baseball ran his string of consecutive victories somewhere close to the dozen mark, while Huggins looked on, sighing and sorrowing over the fact that he had cast aside the most sensational moundman of 1923.

The day that Dazzy's streak was broken he knew it was coming. He says:

"Yes, I knew I'd get whipped that day—all because one of the fellows who helped take care of the club lockers saw my shirt, noticed that it was awfully dirty and needed mending and before I knew about it he had started it off to the laundry. I got it back before anything had been done on it, but the very fact that it was headed for the clean-up shop put a lead upon me that day."
