CHOOSING THE SCHOOL

NEBRASKA'S BIG UNIVERSITY

Its Twenty-Seven Buildings Are Outward Evidence of Marvelous Internal Activity.

MANY OTHER SPLENDID SCHOOLS

The triteness of a truism is in the statement that the University of Nebraska is a great institution. But every Nebraskan is glad to make this statement and to repeat it.

The University of Nebraska is only forty-five years old, yet it ranks with such venerable institutions as the University of Pennsylvania.

Its grounds are fully as large as the Pennsylvania institution, its instructors are of as high standing, its courses are fully as complete. Its location is far better, its grounds more beautiful.

The number of students in the Nebraska institution is now about equal to the number attending the university founded by B. Franklin. Nebraska's university, moreover, has greater liberty than Pennsylvania's, for in the latter most of the courses are open only to men. At Nebraska all courses are open just as freely to women as to men and there is practically no tuition fee to pay.

The University of Nebraska started in 1859, giving a few courses in the classics and the liberal arts. It has gone on from that until today it teaches all the sciences as well, and all the professions except theology.

Many Buildings.

The material-brick and mortar and stone and wood equipment of this great institution is imposing in itself and is the outward sign of the academic worth and the proof of a usefulness in the field of education that has been demonstrated throughout the years of its existence. On its spacious campus, located in the heart of the city of Lincoln, are seventeen large and imposing buildings—most of them in good repair—clustered closely together on a plot of ground four blocks in area, which at this time of the year is a veritable labyrinth of mottled flowerbeds, shrubs, lawns and trees.

At the state farm are ten equally commodious and serviceable structures situated on 820 acres of ground that with extensive cultivation is rapidly becoming the garden spot of the state.

In these buildings are class-rooms, libraries, laboratories and museums—everything that is needed to educate 4,000 students a year.

To meet the university's urgent demand for more room to accommodate its increasing number of students, the legislature has authorized a three-quarter-million for six years, which has provided in all $2,000,000 for university improvement, and which is now available for the university's use.

Still Greater Growth.

In view of what the University of Nebraska now is, as seen by the spectator who spends only a few hours within its gates, the spectacle of how great an institution it will be when $2,000,000 have been spent in enlarging its equipment and increasing its usefulness for the people of the state almost stifles the imagination.

Internally the university gives every evidence of progress. It is doing better work every year. It is constantly raising its educational standards, and the fact that it is doing so is recognized by competing universities of standing and repute. Requirements for admission into the university are higher than ever before; requirements for graduation, still higher. Numbered among its faculty are men of recognized ability as teachers and not a few who have a national reputation as authorities in their several lines; such eminent scholars and men of science as Dean L. A. Sherman, the late Dean Charles Bessey, and Dean O. V. P. Stout; and such noted jurists as Dean W. G. Hastings of the college of law, and Dr. Edwin Maxey, a well known authority on international law.

Engineering Laboratory.

The attention of the technical world was recently attracted to the University of Nebraska by the addition to its equipment of one of the largest and most up-to-date engineering laboratories in the west. The latest improvement is a beautiful and spacious building to be occupied exclusively by the political science and law departments.

The University of Nebraska not only furnishes instruction to those who come to its doors seeking it, but it also extends the advantage of higher education to those who cannot afford the time and expense of years in college. Through correspondence study, public lectures, high school debates and the publication of pamphlets devoted to general information and welfare the university prepares many persons at home for lives of greater usefulness. One hundred students are now doing regular university work and receiving regular university credit by employing their spare hours at home under the direction of the University of Nebraska extension department.

University Publications.

The university also turns out a vast amount of knowledge for general consumption by the people of the state in the form of publications. Besides the annual calendar and other periodic bulletins, there are eleven university papers devoted to all kinds of scientific, literary and educational interests. The various student publications and the published reports of the scientific branches of the university, especially those of engineering and agriculture, constitute an essential part of the great educational service the university is rendering the state.

This year the indications are there will be an even larger registration at this great institution of the state than ever before, but all provisions have been made for the adequate accommodation of all who may knock and enter these halls of learning.

SCHOOL OWNED BY WOMAN.

One of Nebraska's Oldest Business Colleges Conducted by Fair Sex.

A young woman is the owner and manager of one of the most successful business schools in the country, the Van Sant school, located on the second floor of the Weal building, Eighteenth and Farman streets. It has a day school for young women and an evening school for young men and women.

Miss Ione C. Duffy is this young woman. She is herself a graduate of the school, finishing her course there in 1899. Following her graduation she became stenographer and later bookkeeper in the local office of a typewriter company. Her ability raised her quickly to the position of assistant manager, a place which she held for several years until she found still larger fields for her ability and energy. As a pupil Miss Duffy observed the methods of the Van Sant school; as an employer of stenographers, she measured the proficiency of its graduates; and as a director of a clerical employment bureau, she learned in what high regard the school and its graduates were held by business men.

Therefore, when Mr. Van Sant offered his school for sale in 1910, Miss Duffy was a ready purchaser and became sole owner and manager.

"If this school were conducted purely as a normal training school," said Miss Duffy, "we could place all our graduates in good positions as teachers of stenography, so well as they are grounded.

"A scientific business training brings double opportunity and doubly certain results to teachers. The teacher is assured of employment and satisfactory salary either as teacher or stenographer. It is a well-known fact that competent business school teachers draw much larger salaries than those paid in public school work."

A beautiful illustrated booklet about the school has been published for the information of prospective students. It is printed on fine coated paper and profusely illustrated, having pictures of A. C. Van Sant, the founder, Miss Duffy, the owner and a number of the teachers as well as various charming scenes from the school rooms. The frontispiece shows a view of the streets from the school showing the court house grounds and view down Farman street.

The book is well written, beautifully printed and has a handsome embossed cover. It contains all information about the school, prices, history, methods, etc. It is sent on request.

graphic courses, as well as collegiate, academic and domestic science.

It lays special emphasis on Bible teaching and this course is taken by an extraordinary number of its students in connection with their other work. It is physically, mentally and spiritually sound, and an interesting claim that it makes is that expenses of students there are lower than at most institutions.

ST. MARY'S.

An Indiana College for Girls that Has Many Advantages.

Especially beautiful are the grounds and buildings of St. Mary's college and academy, conducted by the Sisters of the Holy Cross at Notre Dame, Ind. It is located within a mile of the University of Notre Dame, two miles from South Bend, Ind., and only two hours' ride from Chicago.

A sound, practical training for life with all its pleasures and vicissitudes is the aim of this college. Thorough instruction and careful training are a part of the curriculum, which is in itself wide in its range.

You Can't Attain Your Full Success Unless You Obtain A BUSINESS EDUCATION

The real big men of this country—the thinkers of the land—are more emphatically demanding that young people (both men and women) have business college training. In the face of this, you can't attain your full success until you do obtain a business education.

What Chance Have YOU When Business Men Stand Thus:

"The untrained man is misfit; educating him in fundamental business practice is expensive. In employing office help preference is given to applicants who have a business college training."—NATIONAL CASH REGISTER CO., Dayton, O.

"Young people who come to us from good business schools are able to qualify at once for better positions than they could otherwise do. We believe in well-established business schools."—CURTIS PUBLISHING CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

"A business education is absolutely necessary. Modern business demands speed in all things, as well as efficiency. The young man or young woman with business training gets the place and a good salary."—CHALMERS MOTOR CO., Detroit, Mich.

Stenography, Stenotypy, Touch-Typewriting, Book-keeping, Private Secretarial Work, Penmanship, Telegraphy or Civil Service (preparatory for a position as railway mail clerk, carrier, or government stenographer or bookkeeper).

New Fall Term Opens Sept. 7th
