"Ma" Sunday--A Genteel Dragon in Her Solicitous Care for "Billy" and the Boys

By CAROLINE B. KING.

Hundreds of persons who vainly sought admittance to the temporary home of Billy Sunday, during that vigorous preacher's recent campaigns in Philadelphia and Paterson, N. J., went away not only disappointed, but full of vituperation for the evangelist's vigilant wife.

A "dragon" they called her, no less than a hard-featured, cross-grained, unchristianlike dragon. Reporters also gave the lady the same title, though very quietly and just among themselves, as they compared notes during that friendly little midnight luncheon, when copy for the day is all in the composing room and they may steal a few hours for recreation.

Mrs. Sunday was quite aware of the appellation she had won. She knew that she was the subject of many a tirade against a saint who went right on being a dragon, guarding her evangelist husband to the best of her ability. She knew just how much he could bear and was not going to stand by and see him harassed by casual callers, browbeaten by reporters, besieged by admiring college boys and girls or worried to death by the general public.

And if constantly watching over him, caring for the minutest detail of his work, defending his short nap between sermons, directing his meals, guarding him from cranks and mothering him all ways constitutes being a dragon, then Mrs. William A. Sunday is a dragon of the most vicious kind.

But--dragons as a rule do not have kindly brown eyes, nor softly-parted, wavy dark hair, strong, capable hands and sympathetic voices. They do not greet one with a warm clasp and bid one adieu with a content smile. Yet all these things are characteristic of Mrs. Sunday.

Wholesome, perhaps, is the word that would apply most fittingly to her if one wanted to describe her briefly; she is so big, and fresh, and breezy, and sincere. She believes absolutely in her prophet and his work and is quite content to stand by and watch him receive all the honors, many of which he could not possibly attain were it not for the care and guardianship of "Ma."

Mrs. Sunday was born in a little backwoods town in Illinois, Dundee by name. She was the fourth of fifth Helen Thompson in an old Scotch family which has settled in Dundee many generations ago.

She was but a tiny child, however, when her parents moved to Chicago, and she grew up on the West Side, in the shadow of the old Jefferson Park Presbyterian church, of which she later became a member. It was in this church, too, that she and the evangelist were married; and he has preached there many times since.

Helen Thompson was 18 when she met her future husband, and like most girls of that age, was very impressionable. When the then famous ball player made his appearance in church one Sunday, his presence created quite a stir, and the young girls walked home from service in groups of two and three, discussing him from every standpoint.

Helen was, perhaps, the least impressed of any, as she had already given her heart, or thought she had, to another youth; but her chum confessed to her that she had met her fate in young Billy Sunday, Helen, sympathetic, then as she has always been, decided to bring the pair together; and, as she was an officer in the Christian Endeavor society, she invited the new church member to her home on the following Sunday afternoon. When he arrived, he found a party of three awaiting him, consisting of Helen, her own "best friend," and her chum. The three spent the afternoon singing hymns, and later went to the evening service together.

But like many another diplomat, Helen found her plans fruitless, for the beau ball player insisted upon accompanying her, and the "best friend" was forced to walk with the chum. This was the beginning of a friendship which terminated in their marriage on September 6, 1888.

"Billy proposed to me on New Year's eve and it was leap year, too, so my small brother, who always acted the part of the bad small boy of the comic supplements when his sisters had company, always declared that I popped the question," said Mrs. Sunday with a smile, in discussing her courtship.
