By MELLIFICIA.

Thursday, October 28, 1915.

T isn't every day, nor every year, for that matter, that Omaha has a a guest out of Burke's Peerage to entertain. But please do not think I would not infer, for the world, that Lady Gregory's title is the lure which has brought the smart ones to worshiping at her shrine.

Yet, as Locke said in his altogether charming "Alice for Short," "A baronet is a baronet." But that was speaking of London. It is all quite guests will be: different in the west. Sir Horace Plunket comes and goes as unobtrusively as he wishes.

One of the striking points of Lady Gregory's visit to our city is tho utter absence of any thought of her title or her rank-true, they are running to the Public Library to read up about her; but it is what she has written and not her standing in Burke's that is eagerly sought.

"What is Lady Gregory?" asked a debutante of her mother. "Why, child!" exclaimed the mother, raising horrifled hands; "don't let any one hear you ask such a question. Don't you know Lady Gregory is a dramatist, a powerful dramatist, and the greatest patron of the Irish

"I know all that," said the bud; "but that is not what I meant, wanted to know if Lady Gregory is a countess, or a marchioness, or the wife of a knight, of if she gets her title of 'lady' through courtesy because she is the daughter of a nobleman."

The mother laughed. "That is so," she said slowly; "she has 'lady' before her name. But, don't you know, I never thought of it until you brought it up now. I have been too occupied realizing What Lady Gregory has written and accomplished for the Irish drama to think of anything else shout her."
