In its motion to dismiss the govern ment's petition, the Kellogg company contended that its ownership of a patent on the cartoon in which its product was marketed gave it the right to fix the price of the product. In its decision the court of appeals says:

"The manufacturer sells at uniform price of $2.50 per case, exacting from the jobber an agreement to charge the re-tailer a specified price, the jobber's de-fault in this agreement authorising the manufacturer to refuse to deal further This provision has been strictly enforced by the defendants, who refuse to continue dealings with any jobbers who fail to maintain prices so
