Why We All Want Diamonds

Frankly confessed—every man and woman would like to own one or more diamonds. Think about yourself for just a moment. Have you a beautiful diamond? No, then you certainly wish you had. There is something that tells you a diamond is one of the most beautiful things in all the world. Why? Because you feel that this stone not only seems to compass all the beauty of the world, but also because it stands as a high mark of influence and distinction. The man who wears a diamond—a good diamond—is lifted above the average lot. He is looked upon with respect. Just as clothes—though they do not make the man—attract attention to him—favorable attention if he is well attired—so does a sparkling stone cause people to regard its wearer with respect and treat him with consideration that is more than common.

We all want to own diamonds, simply because we know that we are elevated to a higher plane in the social and business world. Let a man wear a diamond. On his finger scintillates a carat ring in the tie is a fair-sized, pure white stone, the diamond, the counter moves briskly, he is the epitome of courtesy and gives the owner of the diamond every mark of attention. What has caused all this? Simply the fact that the customer possesses diamonds, the mark of affluence, culture and refinement.

The Edholm store has a large collection of the most beautiful stones in the west. They satisfy the desire for the beautiful which is created when one thinks of buying a fine diamond. Here are those pure white stones and those with the bluish tint—and they are all priced as low as is consistent with the quality of the diamonds offered. The price on each is plainly marked, and from it there is absolutely no deviation for anyone. This rule assures all of the fairest and most exact treatment.
