Radical Members of Norwegian Parliament Have Some Measures that Are Aimed at Royalty.

PAVING WAY FOR A REPUBLIC

Correspondence of the Associated Press.) CHRISTIANIA, May 18.—The socialist situation in this country. and radical members of the Norwegian Since the prohibition movement was ecademic indictment of war and by a Farliament are making a renewed at started here seventy years ago the con-resolution which referred the subject of are to be pressed again. After the union between Norway and country voted upon the question of adopting a monarchial, or a republican form of government. Norway had been a monarchy for 1,000 years and 70 per cent of the people voted to continue that system.

When Prince Charles of Denmark acfts king most of the people shared with him the supposition that he could be sesured of reigning and working on the conditions guaranteed by the constitution. Very soon, however, the socialist and radical politicians began to attempt to restrict the king's prerogatives. After they obtained control of Parliament in 1912 several bills were debated and voted on, but failed to secure the necessary two-thirds majority.

The king has the right to bestow the Royal Order of St. Olav upon natives and foreigners as a decoration of honor, and this has been a personal right of the king which did not concern the cabinet or Parliament. Proposals to take away that right, and to prevent were defeated.

Some Radical Measures.

Bills have now again been presented to abolish the order of St. Olav, and to forbid citizens from accepting decorations, also to forbid the king from attending the opening and closing of Parliament, Another measure proposes to take from the throne the prerogative which he holds as head of the Norwegian church of appointing priests, bishops and other church functionaries. more sweeping than these bills is one dealing with the succession. If the king should die without an heir, under the constitution Parliament would elect his successor. This provides that under cide whether Norway is to continue to be a monarchy. Another would make amendments to the constitution possible by a majority vote instead of two-thirds. There is no dissatisfaction with king Haakon personally in Norway, but the extreme democrats aim at making the institution of monarchy useless and paving the way for a republic. The members of the royal family live with greater simplicity than the heads of most republics. The king and queen ride in the street cars and bicycle about the country roads, and meet the people on a plane of equality.

Under these laws sobriety has generally increased. The restricted sale of liquor. has driven the lower classes of the popution to the use of denatured alcohol, from eau de cologne, ether and shellao, and in many industrial centers and in "dry" towns, "blind jugs" have replaced the licensed sale.

STATE FIRE INSURANCE ADVOCATED IN RUSSIA

the king from attending the Parliament (Correspondence of the Associated Press.) PETROGRAD, May 21.-A project to institute compulsory state fire insurance is now under consideration by the minister of the interior, and will be soon presented to the council of ministers for aproval. The proposal was first made by the budget committee of the Duma, which pointed out the desirability of such a measure as a source of income to the government.

According to preliminary estimates, if this fire insurance monopoly were undertaken by the government, it would yield an income of $15,000,000. The minister of the interior, however, is in favor of the passing of such a measure, not primarily because it would bring a large revenue to the government, but because compulsory insurance is demanded by ings in Russia, which are wooden and but poorly protected against fire. The constant destruction of these wooden buildings by fire has been a perceptible drain on the economic strength of the
