Although a number of Omaha people have already reached home from Europe, where their summer tours were interrupted by the war, and many more have been heard from since hostilities began, there are still quite a number who are yet within the pall of silence which has settled in some parts of Europe ever since the first mobilization was ordered.

Arthur C. Smith Saves Rev. Mackay From Steerage Berth

How Rev. Thomas J. Mackay, rector of All Saints' church, one of Omaha's most fashionable congregations, was unexpectedly rescued from the steerage of the steamship Royal George after embarking for America, is told by Dr. Mackay in a letter just received by his wife.

Arthur C. Smith was the good angel of the rector. The latter had paid for first class accommodations on the boat, but in the confusion that prevailed, he found none left for him.

While preparing to make his bed in the steerage, with many other passengers who would ordinarily travel first class, Dr. Mackay was met by Mr. Smith, who offered him a berth in his stateroom.

Neither had known the other was on the boat until after it sailed.

"The English are confident of success," the minister writes, "but I think the Germans are really much stronger than they are rated by the Britons."

Dr. Mackay is now in Boston, but plans to return to Omaha in time to take up his pastoral duties the second Sunday in September.
