REFORM COMES SLOWLY
 A New Jersey woman is about to found a chain of colonies throughout the United States in which "the two deadly evils," hypocrisy and gossip, will never make their appearance.
 There will be, she says, a series of farming communities each populated by people sworn never to pretend they are what they are not and never to carry idle tales about their neighbors. The inhabitants will be self-sufficient; the inhabitants will raise their own food and will be economically independent of what the false values of a coldly material civilization will not have so many chances to affect them.
 How much headway this plan will make it is hard to tell. Probably everybody would like to live in a place where there are no hypocrites and no gossip, but whether people will want such a goal badly enough to move to a brand-new town to get it is another question. About the only new communities founded these days are the gally-platted real estate subdivisions.
 However the lady's idea is right in line with good old American traditions. Establishing a new town in which some new way of living could be worked out has been a feature of our civilization ever since the revolution.
 Dishearteningly enough few of these communities have kept their distinctive features after the passing of the first generation. They all start out bravely but sooner or later the influence of the outside world creeps in, the ideals of the founders grow dim and shadowy, and presently the children of the men and women who thought they were setting up a new kind of world are living, working and thinking just the way everybody else is.
 And so—though it seems cruel to say—if this New Jersey enthusiast succeeds in founding her chain of towns, one seems safe in predicting that 50 years hence they will be populated by people who are just as hypocritical and just as gossipy as the rest of us are.
 All of this, of course is inevitable. It happens, too, that it is quite right that things should work out this way. The business of reforming the world is a long and laborious task. It can't be done by withdrawing to some isolated spot and practicing perfection in lonely grandeur. To accomplish anything you have to knuckle down right where things are worst and plug away on your own hook—and even then your progress won't be visible to the naked eye.
 Hypocrisy and gossip are deadly evils, to be sure. But you won't help to eradicate them by moving to a new town and asking for a new deal. Each individual must start first with himself. If he perseveres and is conscientious about it, his neighbors may eventually absorb a little of his attitude. And that after all, is the only real way to go about it.

HOT SHOT
 There comes a time in the life of every Milan man when he would give ten dollars if he could read a strange woman's mind when she was sizing him up.
 Maybe the reason little men marry large women is that they're afraid not to.
 Nothing makes the average man madder than to spend $2 for gasoline to get to a fishing place and then find some other fellow's cork right where he had counted on putting his.
 Some women seem to believe that they have sufficient will power to gossip or leave it alone.
 What has become of the old-fashioned man who wore a read-made black bow tie that fastened to his collar button with a wire loop?
 It's all right to cast your bread on the water, but don't expect it to come back with hot dogs and mustard.
