An Omaha doctor says it is no more trouble to remove tonsils than to get a permanent wave. Permanent waves, however, will continue to be more popular.

"Abolish autos or wipe out drink," urges a newspaper reader. Up to now King Automobile and Demon Rum, working together have wiped out a lot of pedestrians.

Cheeses are being sold in modernistic shape, but the old-fashioned kind, served in a welsch rarebit, is still guaranteed to give one a modernistic nightmare.

Talking movies have invaded the insect world. Recently a cricket's music was movie toned. Almost from the beginning talking revues have revealed in moth-eaten jokes.

Off hand, our opinion would be that it is as silly for a man to go into a beauty parlor to be made pretty as it would be for his wife to go to the barber shop to get shaved.

No answer yet has been made to the question of the profane New Yorker who asked: "Where the hell did Sharkey get the nerve to use the American flag for a bathrobe?"

It is more or less significant that every centenarian is induced to relate either that he "never let a drop pass his lips" or that a pretty stiff drink was a daily habit, although it is likely that most of them experienced both ways in their time.

MR. HOOVER AND PUBLIC WORKS

Current periods of business depression, we are coming to see, need not be passively accepted as an inescapable plague, but may be, in a measure, averted by deliberate economic planning on a national scale.

Federal, state and local governments themselves possess a powerful weapon which they might use to incur a greater degree of business stability. The Committee on Economic Changes of the President's conference on unemployment points out that public expenditures on permanent improvements each year represent from 35 to 40 per cent of the total volume of expenditure for all public and private construction. About $3,500,000,000 is expended annually and about 900,000 men are directly employed on public works. In the past, however, public building activity has followed the course of the business cycle. In good times money has been borrowed, taxes have been increased and ambitious construction projects have been undertaken. In bad times, on the contrary, taxes have been cut and the program of public works has been restricted.

Now, however, the realization is growing that business stability demands a policy which is exactly the opposite. At the height of prosperity, labor and capital should be released by the state to private employment, in order that the over-expansion of industrial activity may not be carried to too great lengths. At the approach of depression, however, public construction should be expanded and increasing number of men should be employed on public works. Such employment would increase the purchasing power in the hands of labor, stimulate the demands for the products of private industry and effectively prevent the depths of depression which might otherwise ensue.

Any such program, to be sure, would require the conscious co-operation of Federal, state and local governments and deliberate, advanced long-range planning of public works in order that their use as a balance wheel for industry might be properly timed. We scarcely dare admit that such foresight surpasses the capacity of political administration. The Committee on Economic Changes, indeed, shows that public construction has been increased rather than reduced. During the present depression contracts awarded for public works and public utilities during the first four months of 1930 showed an increase of 30 per cent over the corresponding period of 1929. The Department of Commerce also reports that the total expended for public works during the past six months has amounted to $1,700,000,000, a figure which exceeds that for the first six months of 1929 by as much as $200,000,000.

The use of public works as a stabilizing influence has long been a major interest of President Hoover. As Secretary of Commerce he sat as chairman of the Committee on Economic Changes which has just issued an excellent report on the subject. Before his inauguration he sent a plea for the plan to the Conference of Governors through Gov. Brewster of Maine. In Washington conferences following the stock market crash he urged the continuation and extension of public construction. He has told the Conference of Governors now meeting at Salt Lake City that the plan is necessary "to maintain security of employment, to maintain consumption of goods, to thus contribute to economic stability and above all to relieve hardship." He says that it "adds to the security of the home in this time of stress" and that it "adds courage and hope in time of adversity."

Unfortunately, he has not turned his hand over to get the Wagner bills for relief of unemployment past the partisan obstructionist tactics of the administration-controlled House of Representatives. Nevertheless, the pressure upon the Longworth-Tilson-Snell combine has become so great that the house passed two of the bills and sent the third back to the Senate for compromise. Mr. Hoover could have greatly increased public confidence in his desire to do something for unemployment had he given more than lip service to these bills. If they are to be passed before Congress adjourns thanks will not be due to him but to the force of public opinion.

I see no reason why a man should not be polite to his divorced wife, says Cosma Hamilton, the writer. Indeed not. In fact, why not be polite to her occasionally before the divorce.

Dr. Doran announces that the Volstead law could be enforced if everybody would boycott liquor, and we'd give two bits if we could concentrate and think up a nice deep thought like that.

PRESIDENT ELECT GO VISITING

Mr. Hoover, it seems, started a pleasant tradition when he visited Latin-America in the period between his election and his inauguration. Presidents-elect in countries to the south are giving their approval of Mr. Hoover's journey by following his example. Mr. Hoover the other day, received the third call from his jaunt to the tropics, when Julio Prestes, President-elect of Brazil, visited Washington. Ortiz Rubio of Mexico and Olaya Herrera of Colombia previously had been guests at the White House, and later made more or less extended tours of the country.

It was an excellent move for good will in the Western Hemisphere when a President-elect of the United States visited his country's nearest neighbors. It is an even better sign that these visits are now being returned, and that a precedent for such interchange of amenities seems to have been set. Injection of the personal element into international relations should facilitate the work of the diplomatic channels which hitherto have been the only means of contact.

NOT A CANDIDATE

Jim Reed, former Senator from Missouri, says that no political significance should be attached to his recent blistering speech in Kansas City; that he is not a candidate for the next Presidential nomination. "I was merely talking to Democrats," said Mr. Reed, just as he was about to sail for Europe.

Go ahead and heave your own sigh of relief.

Recent photographs of the Prince of Wales, who has just celebrated his 36th birthday, show very dark circles under his eyes. That boy ought to try sleeping occasionally—one night in the week, at least.
