STYLES IN FICTION
The public state in fiction, like styles in women's dresses, frequently undergoes radical changes.
Pick up almost any magazine nowadays and you will find that a majority of the stories therein deal with the doings of gangsters, racketeers, and other denizens of the lower world, with a sprinkling of World War scenarios.
This class of fiction is evidently written for the consumption of persons who read sketchily, or merely to pass away time. Unfortunately, this constitutes a major portion of the reading public.
It is rather difficult to determine whether, in our reading as well as our thinking, we have grown more sophisticated or easier to please during the past decade.
Books that were popular during the turn of the century give evidence that the people of that period delighted in dukes and duchesses. In England, Anthony Hope constructed his imaginary kingdom of Hentzau and filled it with kings and princesses and prime ministers and pretend-ers and a full complement of the higher nobility; and soon thereafter George Barr McCutcheon gave us his kingdom of Graustark, which was similarly equipped.
F. Marion Crawford, through the medium of fiction, kept us informed of the doings of the Roman and Spanish aristocracy, and we knew when we opened one of his books that, save for butlers and other such accessories, we were in little danger of meeting anyone whose rank was lower than that of a count.
Charles Major, whose name is well-nigh forgotten today, established a new vogue with his "When Knighthood was in Flower," which involved three kings and several queens, and dukes and things like that almost without number. Paul Leicester Ford's popularity depended at least in part on his ability to draw the nobility, and sometimes royalty, into his tales; even in "Janice Meredith," his novel of the American Revolution, he makes his hero a descendant of the ruling house of England, although not on the distaff side.
But, you say, the enthusiasm for the works of Hope and McCutcheon and Crawford and Ford and the rest has waned, and this more realistic age finds no charm in their dream-kingdoms. You say further that we read biographies today and consider this over-romantic stuff silly.
But what of Dumas? Dumas' un-failing charm is not wholly due to his nerve, vigor, and audacity; in addition, he ushers us into stately courts and revives for us the long vanished pageantry.
It is true that the members of his famous quartette are non-royal, and in the case of Porthos seen his nobility is in question. Yet we know that d'Artagnan is inevitably destined to become a marshal of France and that Athos carries his cardinal's hat in his portfolio. More, Dumas makes the old regime live for us again. His Henri III is a portrait at least as satisfying as the d'Artagnan; like Athos, we feel at home with royalty and we understand something of the emotions of Louis XIV.
Dumas' father was a great republican general and Dumas himself was almost a child of the revolution. Yet his greatness lies in the fact that he could reproduce the nobler times. His novels of the revolution, "Chevalier de Maison Rouge," "Countess de Blues," and the rest are rather insipid stuff; his Valois series will survive as long as romanticism endures.
If our taste in fiction has undergone a change, however, our choices in the field of biography show that the love for dukes and duchesses still survives.
The only real difference is that we take our supply of romanticism in a different form. Everybody is not fascinated with stories of the under-world regardless of their multiplicity.
Strachey's "Victoria" and "Elizabeth and Essex" are examples. Here again we are introduced into courts and to the royal and noble personages, and learn to know them intimately. In reality, our interest in these works is similar to the interest of the previous generation in "Graustark" and "Hentzau."
In both cases we are enabled to move in another world, and are pleased to find that the personages who have both splendor and power are remarkably like ourselves. We like to read Saint-Simon, who apologizes when he mentions anyone below the grade of marquis and considers that dukes and cardinals alone are really worthy of his notice.
Such works will always appeal, and it is unfair to say that they appeal to snobbery. Instead, their popularity shows that we are all children, after all; for those who lead rather dull and prosaic lives, they are grown-up fairy stories that show us gorgeous palaces and enchanted lands.

EXIT SEYMOUR

The Republicans will breathe a sigh of relief at the departure of Victor Seymour from the scene, although his resignation as manager of the Western headquarters of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee will not begin to repair the damage done. The Nye committee stripped off the windings of the Grocer Norris mummy and revealed his short-lived candidacy as a contemptible conspiracy to defeat Senator George W. Norris. Grocer Norris and his attorney, A. Paul Johnson, reversed previous testimony to confess that Seymour had induced the ignorant grocery clerk to enter the race and had paid his $50 filing fee.
Seymour, full of protestations and denials that he is guilty "of any wrong act," nevertheless steps out. We do not know what Seymour construes to be right or wrong, but if he can stretch his ethics to justify the Nebraska business, he hardly qualifies to one of the great moral philosophers. It would be interesting to know just how far up the conspiracy to trick Norris out of re-election went. It is inconceivable that Seymour should embark on so daring a stratagem without the knowledge of his superiors. What, for example, does Senator Moses, who once referred to Norris and his Senatorial allies as sons of the wild jackass, know about it.
Moreover, the conspiracy plainly received inspiration and help from the electric power interests, whence the trail leads directly to the Muscle Shoals controversy. Norris' brilliant 10-year fight against surrendering this great public property to private interests for a song has arrayed against him the massed forces of the Power Trust.
The underhanded war against Norris is as much an economic fight as it is a political one.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

WOMEN'S PEDESTAL

While chronic letter writers are complaining through the papers that giving rights to women has lost for them much of the courtesy and respect they were formerly shown in public as well as in private life, complaint is made by an English visitor—a man—that the man of America have become satisfied and even sickeningly ostentatious toward women since they secured political freedom and are giving to them "a species of oriental obeisance and ceremony almost approaching edification."
Another Englishman, seeking a divorce in Paris from his American wife charges that she, from the very wedding day, sought to crush his dignity, treated him like a servant and tried to force him to kneel to her mother.
Perhaps these men are only having their joke about the American women, but they should take warning and not aggravate that ideal man, the American husband, too far, lest the worm turn.
Somebody says that the Socialist Party is anxious to acquire an emblem from the animal kingdom to match the elephant, donkey and camel of other parties. So far as we know the goose and house fly are unclaimed.

Your guarantee of BETTER LUBRICATION NEW Polarine THE MODERN MOTOR OIL

New Polarine is made to the higher standards of scientific lubrication required by modern motors.
Wax, tar and other non-lubricating elements are removed from new Polarine. Oxidizing ingredients which form sludge in the crankcase and sometimes cause clogging of the oil lines and over-heating of the motor are all removed.
The carbon content of new Polarine is less than half as much as that of old process oil. New Polarine stays clean longer.
New Polarine is made from selected oils and varies least in body from zero temperatures to the operating heat of the motor. It guarantees effective lubrication under all operating conditions.
For these reasons, new Polarine in the crankcase of truck, tractor and passenger car is your best guarantee of safe, protective lubrication—25¢ a quart.
At Red Crown Service Stations and Dealers and delivered everywhere in Nebraska. Consult the new Polarine Chart for correct grade.
