Name Doak as the New Secretary of Labor

Hoover Spurs A. F. L. Demand in Appointing Trainmen's Legislative Agent

Washington, Nov. 29.—Disregarding the declaration of the American Federation of Labor, which, through its president, William Green, told him Tuesday it would favor only a man who carries a federation card, President Hoover announced Friday afternoon he had appointed William N. Doak to succeed James J. Davis as secretary of labor.

Doak is the legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and editor of the Railroad Trainmen, a trainmen's magazine, and is not a member of the federation. He is a native of Roanoke, Va., and has maintained a home and offices here since 1918.

Mr. Hoover had Doak's name down for the secretaryship prior to his inaugural, when he was forming his cabinet during his sojourn in Florida. The American Federation of Labor heard about it and was so strenuous in its opposition to the trainmen's executive that the President thought it best to ask Davis to continue in office.

Davis relinquishes the office at noon Monday, when he takes the office of United States senator from Pennsylvania. He has held office continuously since March 4, 1921, when he was appointed by the late President Harding, and he has served under two other Presidents, Coolidge and Hoover.

Davis carries a union card, as did William B. Wilson, Blossburg, Pa., first man to hold the portfolio of secretary of labor.

The Department of Commerce and Labor was made into two separate departments during the first administration of the late President Wilson by act of congress.

Doak was the son of a confederate soldier, who began his journey toward success by swinging on the ice-coated steps of boxcars.

At 21, he joined the brotherhood and served as local chairman and legislative representative as well as president of his lodge for several years.

He was elected vice president of the brotherhood in 1916. In 1917, he was elected assistant president.

Doak, who is 47 years old, had been connected with all the recent wage movements for trainmen. He has acted as mediator in some cases.

Politically he is a conservative Republican.—Bee-News.

Indian Bureau to Help Tribal Social Service

Effort Under Way to Use Best of Traditions, Arts and Handicrafts

Washington—The Bureau of Indian Affairs is turning its attention to the development of a proper kind of social service for the Indian, long overlooked in the struggle to safeguard his property rights.

Pointing to the problem which confronts the effort to make the Indian self-sustaining, Charles J. Rhoads, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, explains that practically no two groups of Indians are alike either in inheritance or present environment.

While inevitably the Indian must develop such interests as may enable him to become a component part of organized civilization, the fact that what is best of his own traditions, arts, crafts and associations must be developed at the same time, adds to the problem, he points out.

The more essential elements of a sufficient organization have been obtained by the commissioner. In the field of education there has been obtained through civil service channels a man of training and experience as director of education, an assistant director of education, and supervisors of secondary and of elementary education whose activities are directed toward the improvement and development of the existing system of Indian boarding and day schools maintained by the Federal Government.

Under the supervision of elementary education are a number of especially qualified demonstration teachers who work in the field with the elementary teachers for the improvement of the teaching service.

Approximately 38,000 Indian children are now yearly entered in the state public schools, the report states. Tuition for Indian children was more than during the prior year. Increased appropriations for support of Indians in federal schools made possible additional subsistence, clothing, equipment, furniture and personnel.
