SEEKING THE SAME GOAL

Friendship is a strange sort of thing. It appears, sometimes, where you would least expect it, and flourishes in spots where you would suppose that it could find nothing whatever to feed on.

So it is with the friendship between Clarence Darrow and Dr. Clarence True Wilson. It was revealed at Houston recently that these two men, who are in public bitter foes on almost any question one can call to mind, are in private extremely warm friends. The wet agnostic and the dry fundamentalist have debated with each other a great deal and have traveled together a great deal; and somewhere they have found a common ground, where mutual admiration and esteem can grow unchecked.

Dr. Wilson's discussion of the growth of friendship is very much worth reading. It increases, somehow, one's respect for both men. He says:

"The fact is, if any one can be a Christian without knowing it, I think it would be Clarence Darrow, for if you make a list of the Christian qualities which a Christian ought to have, such as living according to the Golden Rule, loving everybody, taking up for the ones who need it most, standing against privilege and in favor of the under-privileged, he lives what we teach as the best standards of life."

That, coming from a devout churchman to a man who mounts lecture platforms to denounce religion, coming from a militant dry to one of the nation's most outspoken wets, is a remarkable tribute. It points to something that is of considerable importance; namely, that men can travel toward the same goal by the most diverse roads, and that they can make the going smoother for themselves and others if they are broad enough to realize that there are, in the old phrase, many paths to salvation.

Each of these men has devoted his life to a battle for the truth as he has seen it. Each one has fought lustily for the sake of a cause. Each of them has been, and is, what we call a visionary—a man who has caught a glimpse of the fair place that men might make of this world if they only would, and who cannot rest until he has given all of his energy and all of his strength to the expounding of his vision.

On the surface, they have been violently opposed. But underneath? They are working toward the same end—to make the world a more decent place, to remove a bit of its old sin and suffering and hopelessness, to enable people to get more out of their lives in the shape of happiness and the fulfillment of high desires.

If the rest of us—followers of one or the other of these two men, or perhaps occupants of the wide middle ground between them—could only realize as they have realized that we are, after all, seeking a common goal, even though we can't agree on the best method of getting there, wouldn't there be a good deal less of bitterness and misunderstanding in American life today? And wouldn't that be an excellent thing for all of us?

STRENGTHENING CIVIL SERVICE

For a number of years there has been a great deal of talk about extending civil service into Federal departments now filled by appointment under the plum-pie system. There also has been a great absence of action. Proponents of the merit system took heart at the election of President Hoover, who promised efficient reorganization of Government departments. It was recognized that any really efficient administrative change would entail wide expansion of the civil service.

The pain of the National Civil Service Reform League, which recently deplored the indifference of the President to the need for civil service reform, should be somewhat ameliorated by his action in placing under the Federal classified service all employees of the Government of the District of Columbia. By this executive order more than 6,000 positions cease to be the gift and trading stock of office holders and will be filled by applicants who prove themselves on examination to be capable.

This is a large gain for the Federal merit system. It will be still more important if it indicates intention of the President to ignore the threats and opposition of spoilsmen and to extend the classified service to cover other over-manned and under-efficient bureaus and departments. It is in his power to do so, and every move to check the selection of Federal employees solely from among the friends and henchmen of politicians will meet with public approbation.

All the nations need at Geneva is to take the "next" out of war.

GOLD AND PROSPERITY DISCUSSED

As a result of a report by the gold delegation of the league of nations that the production of gold will begin to diminish in 1934, the old controversy is being waged again by economists as to the actual relationship between gold supply and prosperity. One school of thinkers attributes this and preceding depressions to shortage of gold, or at least, disparities in the worldwide distribution of the quantity. Another school inclines to the idea that depressions have been due to other causes.

One principle appears not to be disputed. This is that a certain supply of gold is requisite for a certain volume of business. Another principle that is generally accepted is that the quantity of gold in circulation has a close connection of equation with prices; that is, when the supply of gold is large, its price is low, and, on the other hand, when the supply is small, the purchasing value of gold is greater. This is a variation, as applied to gold as a medium of exchange, of the law of supply and demand.

The mistake that many persons make when the subject of gold is considered is in judging business by it. Money—and gold is money—is a medium of exchange. It is not exchange proper; it is not business; it is the medium with which business is carried on. So, while it is a fact that the medium of exchange in adequate volume is necessary, the flow of gold from one country to another is not business, but a consequence of it; that is, the country which, at a given time, exports more goods than it imports, receives gold payment if settlement cannot be made in trade.

There is some sound sense in the theory that business would revive more quickly in countries whose gold supply would have the effect of raising prices, and, as a result, of narrowing or eliminating international price disparities. Almost certainly, it would have aided American farmers immensely had foreign consumers been enabled by gold or business credit to purchase our grains. You may think out rather easily why this credit was not provided.

It is business that makes business, and not gold that makes business. Money is a medium of exchange. There is a point of prosperity at which business is conducted at loss, with production cost exceeding or tending to exceed price. Then occurs the reaction, and both prices and costs fall, and the gold supply lies idle.

Those nations which have low production costs and low prices are in excellent position to stimulate their business. They would be, that is, had they not constructed barriers against one another and prescribed trade. The flow of gold would follow the trend of business activity were artificial impediments removed.

China wants to borrow a billion ounces of silver from us, and no doubt Russia one of these days will ask for a hundred million pennies.

"Brave men," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "forgive easily, because they feel that they can punish if they choose."

THE PUNISHMENT

They Get in the First Few Minutes Decides How Long They Will Last

And so it is with your motor... 40% to 60% of all motor wear occurs in the first few minutes after starting, because ordinary oils drain away in idle periods. But CONOCO Germ-Processed oil is always on guard duty, never drains away, penetrates metal surfaces, reduces starting wear. A step on the starter always takes ordinary oils unawares, and it is then that most damage occurs in your motor. By draining away during idle periods, ordinary oils "let down their guard" and let your motor in for severe punishment at a time when protection is vitally needed. On the other hand, Germ-Processed oil always has its guard up. Its film penetrates and clings to every working part while the motor is idle. The first motor revolution finds ready lubrication guarding every clearance. The 40% to 60% of wear which might have taken place before you ever shift a gear is substantially reduced. Thousands of motorists have found that this improved motor oil prolongs motor life and gives better all-round performance. You can find CONOCO Germ-Processed Motor Oil wherever you see the CONOCO Red Triangle.
