Anniversary of Big Blizzard that Swept Nebraska

Old Settlers Recall Easter Storm of 1873 Which Lasted for Three Days

From Tuesday's Daily— Today is the fifty-eighth anniversary of the big Easter storm, which many old time Nebraskans remember. It began on Easter Sunday, April 11, 1873 and lasted for three days. Although many people can recall the blizzard few of them still live on the spot where they experienced the big storm. Mrs. Aaron F. Anderson of Seward, who is spending a few days in Lincoln, still lives on the farm where she and her husband saw the Easter storm develop from a mild spring mist into a snow storm of gigantic proportions. The next morning they found snow drifted high on the windows, making the house dark, and the storm still raging.

At the end of three days, the blizzard having subsided, Mr. Anderson made his way to the barn and found it filled with snow which had blown in from the log roof. The horses were snowed in solid, even their heads being entirely covered. Patiently beside their mothers two little calves had stood for three days, packed in the snow. Above the head of each animal was a small hole through which it had been breathing, the warmth of its breath keeping a passageway for air. None seemed nuzzing by the experience although weak from standing so long without food.

Illustrating the violence of the storm Mrs. Anderson tells of a neighbor who went outside on the first night of the storm to see how the chickens were faring. The wind caught him and he was not able to stop until he was blown against some rough surface which resisted the force of the wind. Feeling his way around over this surface he discovered that it was a sod house. In a few moments he had felt his way to the door, was admitted and found that he was at a neighbor's half a mile away.

Mrs. Anderson, who is one of the early settlers in Seward county will have lived on the same farm four miles from Seward, sixty years next November. The house which her husband built in 1868 still stands by a beautiful modern residence.

She had climbed into a small tree in her play and losing her balance in the tree fell to the ground several feet below and alighted on the right arm in such a manner as to cause the fracture.
