Further Study is Urged Upon Idle Teachers

Best Way, Dr. Payson Smith, Massachusetts Commissioner Says, to Get Better Jobs

Continued study toward higher education, which will better one's chances of obtaining a good position, Dr. Payson Smith, Massachusetts Commissioner of Education, thinks, is the wisest course for those normal school graduates who face unemployment because of oversupply of teachers.

If graduates do not choose this course, he says, then they must either remain idle until they can find an opening or they must take a chance of finding employment in other branches of business.

As another means of meeting the problem, some have suggested the closing of normal schools for a period, but the commissioner thinks that under such a plan, it would be necessary to extend it to schools of journalism, agriculture, business administration or similar institutions, which, he says, also contribute to the unemployment situation.

The teacher surplus, which has been a problem in Massachusetts for several years, has increased greatly, according to Dr. Smith. Last year, out of 903 graduates from state normal schools, 268 were unemployed, according to figures furnished by the commissioner, while this year, though the total number of graduates fell to 793, there were 453 unemployed.

Have Been Few Discharges Among the causes for this shortage of position for teachers, Dr. Smith says, is that there have been very few discharges because of depression. Another reason he gives is the continuance of most teachers now employed to hold onto their positions rather than give them up for uncertainties. A little more than a decade ago, the commissioner says, the average term of service for a teacher was about six years, while in the past two years it has increased until the average is now 13 or more years.

There are three classes of "unemployed" teachers at present, Dr. Smith says. In the first group are those who have prepared for teaching and have been graduated from the normal schools. The second group represents those who have gone through college in preparation for other occupations but, due to the unemployment situation, have turned to teaching as a profession.

With these, he says, the first group is finding considerable competition. And then there is the third class—not properly "unemployed teachers"—which has "taught" in schools in the past, resigned from that work to pursue other types of business and since the depression is endeavoring to return to the educational field for employment.

Considers Only First Group. Dr. Smith considers only the first of these groups as legitimate "unemployed" teachers. But this situation is not limited to the State of Massachusetts, he says, it is a nationwide problem.

The commissioner does not favor any endeavor to weed out of the school system such teachers as are found unsuited for the work as a means of employing those who appear to be better suited. This is not only unwise and would seriously upset the organization, he says, but the local school committees are supposed to see that suitable teachers are appointed to the schools in the first place, which would not necessitate any weeding out.

Dr. Smith is of the opinion that the problem of employing married teachers is also up to the local school committees, though he says it has long been the practice in Massachusetts to give preference to those who were unmarried and who depended solely upon their teaching as a means of support.

Town in Texas Wins Fight for Incorporation

Fredericksburg One of Oldest Towns in Texas Named for Prussian Prince by Colonists.

Austin, Texas—Fredericksburg, one of the oldest towns in Texas, has won its fight for incorporation. It's citizens voted on May 10, 1928 to take such action, but for the last three years a contest has been waged in the courts to have the election declared void on charges of gerrymandering.

The case was tried first in the local district court, where a decision was given upholding the incorporation. It was then taken to the Court of Civil Appeals at San Antonio, thence to the State Supreme Court, where it was reversed and a new trial ordered. Recently, District Judge Carl Runge, presiding at a four-day trial, sustained the validity of the incorporation.

Fredericksburg was settled on May 8, 1846, by a party of 120 men, women and children, as one of the early colonies of the Society for the Protection of German Immigrants in Texas. It was named for Prince Frederick of Prussia, one of the members of the society.

There is a great deal of good cultivable land on the plateaus and in valleys near Fredericksburg. Cedar oak grow profusely over a large part of the county. Granite is quarried extensively and a wide variety of minerals are found. Situated in the picturesque hill country of the Edwards Plateau, the vicinity has proven an attractive resort.

Fredericksburg possesses a wealth of interest for the person who is interested in early Texas. Its "Sunday houses," or small town cottages built many years ago by rural residents who came to the town to spend the Sabbath day near the house of worship, the famous among artists and students of architecture. These houses are peculiar to this German town of 2500 population.

LIQUOR STILL EXPLOSION

Los Angeles—Explosion of two large liquor stills in a warehouse here late Thursday scattered flaming debris which started fires in a dozen or more nearby dwellings and sent hundreds of persons fleeing for safety. Several firemen were slightly burned by geysers of flaming alcohol and gasoline, but first reports indicated no one was killed.

After preliminary investigation by federal prohibition agents, police and fire department officials, Chief Field Agent Nee, of the government prohibition bureau, said rivalry between two bootlegging organizations was responsible for the blast.

Swope Has Drafted Trade Constitution

Safeguard Employer and Worker and Solve Permanently Problem of Hard Times.

New York—A "business constitution" designed to federate all American industry in working out an economic plan to safeguard employer and worker and solve permanently the problem of "hard times" has been drafted by Gerald Swope, president of the General Electric company.

Swope outlined his plan to 600 members of the National Electrical Manufacturers association at a banquet.

The plan calls for organization of each industry into a trade association regulating production thru agreement of trade practices and ethics, and providing standard accounting methods and regular financial reports.

Labor's interests are protected thru provisions for workers' compensation, old age pensions, life and disability insurance, and unemployment insurance.

The interest of the general public is protected thru federal supervision. The federal trade commission, under the department of commerce would regulate companies and trade associations.

Swope's plan gives the workman a sense of security in his job and tends to remove fear of the "forty year deadline" as he grows older.

The proposal was drafted in consultation with leaders of the electrical industry—albeit it was planned to embrace all United States industries—and has the tacit approval of that group.

Owen D. Young, board chairman of General Electric, also spoke at the dinner and heartily endorsed the plan.

Swope said five principles underlie his program:

"Every effort should be made to stabilize industry and thereby stabilize employment to give the worker regularity and continuity of employment, which is his practice, unemployment insurance should be provided.

"Organized industry should take the lead, recognizing its responsibility to its employees, to the public, and to its stockholders—rather should act thru its government."

"There should be standardized forms of reports so that stockholders may be properly informed.

"Production and consumption should be co-ordinated on a broader and more intelligent basis, thus tending to regularize employment and thereby removing fear from the minds of the workers as to continuity of employment; as to their surviving dependents in case of death; and as to old age.

"Every effort should be made to preserve the benefits of individual originality, initiative and enterprise, and to see that the public is assured that its interests will be protected."

Adoption of the proposals will require modification of "some existing laws," Swope admitted. By this it was understood to refer to the Sherman anti-trust laws.

Swope's plan would benefit the individual worker in the following manner:

He would be protected by workmen's compensation.

He would receive a life and disability insurance policy with a face value equal to a year's pay, paid for by the worker and the company on equal terms.

He would receive a pension on retirement from a fund to which he and the company had contributed equally. The pension would equal half his regular pay.
