There is some virtue in almost every vice except hypocrisy.

A helping hand beats all the bunk that is being handed out by banking houses.

Not aimed at anybody in particular, but the smaller the man the larger his vanity.

The chief trouble with the World Court is that France and her little allies outvote nations twice their size.

Scientists tell us that Shakespeare died of twelve diseases, all fatal. Either of the number would therefore have been sufficient.

Life would be so much more pleasant if all of us enjoyed ourselves as much as does a dog rolling in the dirt right after it has been bathed.

It's all right to abandon the gold standard, but in a crisis like this it would throw the whole country into gloom to go off the silver standard for claud linings.

The more we think about it, the more nearly convinced we are that Governor Long's parents were acting under the influence of a prophetic vision when they gave him his first name.

The United States government has displayed considerable impudence in placing Al Capone on trial for evasion of the income tax, but after all, isn't the government carrying the outrage a little too far in arresting the gang chief's bodyguard for carrying a pistol into court?

Youth is a theory; old age is a fact.

Sometimes it's the man who doesn't hesitate who gets lost.

"Buy Until It Hurts," says a slogan. Oh, but we get hurt so easily!

A tip to bankers: Money must either work or fry to death in its own fat.

A football hero is a football hero because ten other men have cleared the path for him.

It looks like the chief issue now is whether we shall borrow money or borrow trouble.

Women can vote in Spain now if they're 23. Which complicates it for the gals passing for 18.

After a lot of sober thought on the subject, we have reached the conclusion that a great economist is one who can tell you, after something has happened, just why it did happen.

The government of Rome is going to award the city of Cincinnati a gift in the form of a bronze wolf, thus honoring the only American city named after a Roman hero. Ship it back! We have enough wolves at our doors already.

This is Doughnut Week in the United States and everybody is being urged to eat doughnuts. Although the melancholy fact remains that it takes dough to buy doughnuts, go ahead and do your darndest for the doughnuts.

The dear old family mortgage still lingers on the premises and doesn't seem to know it isn't welcome.

When the American Legion declares that it wants beer, it looks like the American Legion is going to get beer. Anyhow, the boys always got what they demanded over in France.

A California woman sues her husband for divorce because he insisted on moving 31 times in five years. And all along they have been telling us that any spot in California is just next door to heaven.

How about going back from the gold standard to the wampum standard? Ethnologists, in all their minute researches, have never found traces of business depression among the Indians, as long as that monetary policy prevailed.

Gandhi has decided to postpone his projected visit to the United States. This seems a wise enough move, inasmuch as this country wouldn't have time to pay very much attention to him until after the close of the football season, anyway.

BOSTON'S POPULATION

In colonial days Boston was a metropolis. For many decades thereafter the city was one of the two or three largest in the nation. But recently Boston has occupied a position fairly well down on the census list; and this fact has been something of an injustice to the city of beans, codfish, and Cabots.

The official figures on the "metropolitan area," recently released, tell a truer story. Within 20 miles of Boston Common, it is now revealed, there dwell 2,307,597 people. Metropolitan Boston, accordingly, is properly fourth on the list of big cities—ahead of every city except New York, Chicago and Philadelphia.

Boston, as it happens, is enriched by a ring of suburbs that refuse to be annexed. Three of these suburbs—Cambridge, Somerville, and Lynn—are cities of more than 100,000 population. So Boston, a huge urban center, gets a census count of less than 800,000, and is technically smaller than several cities that are not, actually, as large.

HOOVER AND DEBTS

The Washington dispatches show that President Hoover is seeking a line of further retreat from his party's and his own position on debts and reparations. In form, he is holding to the old thesis that the debt settlements are based, from the American standpoint, on our debtors' capacity to pay. Those that come forward and say they cannot pay or can pay only part will be let off so long as they continue in poverty. But since, in fact, it is perfectly easy for our debtors, with the exception of France, to give a demonstration that they cannot pay, this attitude of the president's is equivalent to saying that he is willing to forego payment of a large part of the debts, perhaps all, for a considerable period.

It is not a very clear-cut method of dealing with a perfectly well known state of affairs which calls plainly for reversal of policy, but it is a step in the right direction. And if we cannot have the administration take up openly and directly the whole problem of debts—and of the German reparations from which our debtors paid us while they were making payments—at least is something to the good that we have the administration wriggling toward the end that must inevitably be reached soon or late, and the sooner the better for all concerned. In this wriggling process, there will be difficulties as there would be in a direct approach. Foolish members of congress must be considered, and their reluctance to admit publicly by actions and votes that they have indulged in an immense amount of balderdash in late years. French intransigence must be considered. Feebleness in other debtor nations, which inertly continue to maintain and expand great armaments while their own people suffer, must be considered, and so must the natural disturbance of the American people over the spectacle of these nations saying they cannot pay while they go on with their armaments. Sidling up to the problem removes few difficulties and may increase some, but, again we say, it is better than inaction.

The important thing is that Mr. Hoover is at work on this matter of debts and reparations, which, with the strangulation tariff policy of this country, and the inducement it has been to other nations to follow our example, constitutes the gravest obstacle to recovery of industry and trade from the bottom up. In this work, Mr. Hoover should have the encouragement of enlightened opinion. He should have behind him a public sentiment which will stir him to bolder action and guard him against the danger of timidity and hesitation when the blind debts-are-debts crew cuts loose in the capital.

—Baltimore Sun.

HERO'S ROLE FOR POLICEMEN

Most thoughtful Americans—even those who have been unmercifully "called down" for a minor and unintentional infraction of a traffic regulation—will indorse President Hoover's good word for the police. Especially will they second that part of his message to the convention of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, where he said: "Instead of the glorification of cowardly gangsters, we need the glorification of policemen who do their duty and who give their lives in public protection."

The police are the shock troops of society's war on crime and they must have the re-enforcement of public support. Too often this support is doubtful or wavering; because some members of police forces have proved unworthy of the trust placed in them. Such betrayals are not to be condoned. But while politics remains what it is in many large American cities, and public apathy continues, police officers who do their duty—especially unspectacular duty—must rank as heroes.

It has been said that a part of the traditional American tendency to take sides "agin' the government"—and the government's police arm—is due to a lawlessness that had its roots in untrammeled pioneering. This may have led American police to take the attitude that any citizen is ready to break the law, which is in striking contrast with the European officer's usual view that citizens will obey the law and will support him in enforcing it.

This may be developed, too, the discourtesy and reliance on "strong-arm methods" which too often mark American police. Anyone who has ever watched a London "bobbie" holding back with mere words and impregnable good humor a tempestuous cockney crowd intent on pushing in to a soccer match—"Now, now, easy; they'll be able to start this match even if you aren't in there"—must have sensed not only the superiority of chaffing to clubbing as a police measure, but also a different attitude on the part of the crowd.

May it not be that this difference has its source not only in the splendid traditions of London's police and their superior technique, but in Britain's vastly better record of court convictions? Would not the morale of American police be tremendously improved by court reforms that would end a condition under which the policeman sees four-fifths of the criminals he apprehends turned loose through political intrigue or legal chicanery?

Certainly the police can do much to build up the hero's role for themselves. But the public must also do its part.

WAGE EQUALITY FOR WOMEN

Equalization of wages for men and women doing the same quality and quantity of work has been advocated by Miss Mary Anderson, chief of the women's bureau of the Department of Labor, as a means of remedying the unemployment problem.

The key to Miss Anderson's proposal lies in her statement that in competition for positions "women are apt to be given the preference where they can do work equally well as men because of the lower wage standards in force for them."

This argument, as presented by Miss Anderson, is perhaps the strongest thus far advanced in the campaign for equal wages. Naturally, few employers are willing to pay $40 a week for work they can have done for $25. The fact that a man demanding $40 has a family to support is not usually taken into consideration by the hard-pressed business man when a woman, seeking the job, will take it at $25.

With the man and woman applicants asking an equal wage for the same position, the employer would be forced to make his choice, not on a money basis, but on actual merit. The employer could also take into consideration the applicant's need for work. The man with a family to support would naturally be chosen over a married woman who did not need employment. The assumption, of course, is not that there will be more jobs, but that they will go to those who need them most.

Miss Anderson also presents her plan as a means of keeping men's wages high by bringing those of women to the same level. If equal wages merely meant a scaling down for men, it would tend to force their wives to seek jobs, thus augmenting the influx of women into business and further breaking down the old idea of home.

There is little prospect of an early acceptance of this proposal by business in general, but it offers an argument which should certainly encourage further advances toward wage equality for women.

By the way, what has happened to the Interstate Commerce Commission? It seems to have dropped completely out of the picture. Boy, please page the I. C. C.
