Making Good Bridles
A. J. Tool, who knows good workmanship and how to do it, has been turning out some excellent bridles, which he is selling at $3 each. The weight of the bridles single is four and a half pounds of the very best of leather and for which the catalog houses charge 50 cents more and you have to pay the carriage charges in addition. You can see these bridles at the shop where they are made before you buy them and know just how they are made. It requires Mr. Tool, who is an excellent workman, one-half day to make a bridle, but when it is completed you may know that the work has been done right and the material is of the very best.

Receives Word Brother Dies

"Mr. Neitzel was born in Germany on July 26, 1856, and came to America from his home in the old country 52 years ago.

"He was united in marriage in 1917 to Miss Carrie Fuchs, who survives the husband. In 1894, Mr. Neitzel entered into a partnership with H. G. Christman, which continued for two years, after which Mr. Neitzel entered business for himself, continuing the building business for twenty-three years and in 1911 retiring to assist the widow, he leaves four children, they being Susanna, Bernadine, Barnhardt and Louis Neitzel, all making their home with the parents. Nies, of South Bend, also three brothers, Paul Neitzel, of South Bend; Louis Neitzel, of Murdock, Nebraska; and Herman Neitzel, of Boise, Idaho, are among the survivors.

More Grief for Leopold Faces Four-Point Future

Archduke, Scion of Austrian Royalty, Once Jailed in New York, Is Challenged to Four Duels for Breach of Military Etiquette

Rescued from the ignominious cell he occupied in the Tombs Prison, New York, by Mrs. Alicia Coburn, wealthy American widow, when he was held in connection with the disappearance of his aunt's $400,000 necklace, Archduke Leopold of Austria showed his gratitude to his benefactress by becoming engaged to Mrs. Coburn and then jilting her. His popularity in his native Austria, whence he drifted after his release from durance, reached a new low as a consequence of his shabby behavior. Cold-shouldered by his own set in Austrian society, Leopold recently gave the young bloods of Vienna the opportunity for which they have been aching to show him what they think of his Grace's ungraceful conduct. Dressed in hunting costume, the archduke visited a Viennese night club, the breast of his suit blazoning with an array of medals and decorations. Badges of honor for which the noblest of Austrian aristocracy had given their lives or shed their blood. Leopold had wrongly located the decorations upon his ducal person, one that should have been worn around his neck being fastened on his belt buckle. The upshot of the affair was that the archduke found himself the recipient of no less than four challenges to mortal combat on the field of honor. The challengers, three counts and a baron, being considered among the foremost swordsmen in Austria, the future looks blue and brief for the stormy petrel of the House of Hapsburg—that is if he doesn't wear his decorations for a mor.

Vienna, Austria—To paraphrase a celebrated, defunct statesman, "Some are born great, some achieve greatness and some just grate upon one." Apparently into the last-named category comes Archduke Leopold of Austria, scion of the noble but crumbling House of Hapsburg, for it would appear that the nobleman is born to trouble, just as others are born to fallen arches.

Leopold is no stranger to the United States, having spent a very pleasant—well, maybe not so pleasant—sojourn in the Tombs Prison at New York when he was accused of the conjuring trick that resulted in the disappearance of a $400,000 necklace, the property of his aunt, the Archduchess Marie Theresa.

On that occasion he was released from bondage through the good offices of Mrs. Alicia Gibson Coburn, a wealthy American widow, who found the necessary bail and financed Leopold through his ducal martyrdom. In return, the Archduke vowed eternal devotion and sailed from New York tentatively engaged to the wealthy widow.

His going was watched by many of his acquaintances in America with keen interest and a mental promise to observe carefully his future progress. And now it appears that the archduke has broken off his engagement with the woman who had stood his only friend when he was in a mess of trouble in America. That act on his part made him—not to be harsh—unpopular in Vienna.

The jilting of Mrs. Coburn started such antagonism against the noble duke that even his own set gave him the well-known frigid shoulder, and many young bloods of Austrian aristocracy made it plain that they would welcome an excuse to show His Grace what they thought of his ungraceful conduct.

The opportunity came recently when the noble duke wandered into a Viennese night club dressed in hunting costume. Not that anybody cared very much how he dressed, but up on the breast of his coat blazed an array of medals and decorations for the honor of which men of the Old Empire had died upon a score of battlefields.

What was worse, some of them were wrongly located upon the ducal person. For instance, one which should have been worn around his neck was fastened in the region of his belt buckle.

Smack, smack, smack and again smack—in less time than it takes to say "prosperity is just around the corner," Leopold was the recipient of no less than four challenges to combat upon the field of honor.

The challengers are three counts and a baron—Counts Arco-Zinneberg, Grassich and Rex and Baron Stuckhart. All were officers in the Austrian Imperial Army, and represented such an insult to its traditions as that of which Leopold had been guilty. What is more to the point (no pun intended) they are all expert swordsmen, so the duke will have a keen time if he keeps the engagements to which he has been invited.

Dueling is still the favorite method of settling arguments in the upper stratum of Austrian society, so it is very doubtful if Leopold can wriggle out of his affairs of honor without being eternally disgraced in the eyes of the entire country.

However, the joke will be on his adversaries if Leopold insists upon wearing his decorations. His fencing bouts, as they constitute, as fine a suit of armor as any knight of old would wish to have.

It also is shown that 53,413 jail days were given in sentences, and ten men were sent to prison. There are 802 cases pending.

Fines totaling $263,932.50 were assessed against violators but not all this can be collected. County or state officers confiscated 112 automobiles which were sold for $11,425.87.

Douglas county reported 4,099 arrests. Lancaster 419, Dodge 137, Buffalo 130, Hall 313, Adams 12.

Endres compares the 1931 report with that submitted at the close of 1930, when there were 3,065 arrests, fines assessed of $234,974.75, and proceeds from confiscated cars of $12,113.24.
