CORN IN EGYPT

There is corn in Egypt, said the patriarch to his sons. So waste no time but take plenty of funds. And go to Pharaoh and knock at his door. Perhaps he will open it, if you simply implore.

The famine is grievous and our stock looks gaunt. And our families are famishing with hunger and want. Why look ye with such a vacant stare.

When you know there is corn in Egypt and some to spare?

So the sons took their wagons and to Egypt went. And approached the governor who before them were sent. Who stored up the corn from seven years' yield. From bounteous crops that grew in the field.

Joseph was governor and thought it was grand.

To see his brethren from a far distant land. To buy corn in Egypt for their families and knee. To save an old patriarch from the hunger line.

There was plenty of corn, as the story is told. Portrayed in its beauty it never grows old. The hand of Providence was therefore seen. For their flocks and herds were taken to pastures green.

There is plenty in Egypt though the country is dark. But fear don't help to kindle a spark. Of faith so needed in this Egypt of despair.

To go to your neighbor and invoke him to play fair. The rains will come and floods of light. Has already been shown to those who desire the right. That the Omnipotent law is spiritual and grand. And the obedient shall be fed though strangers to the land.

Why stay in Egypt, ye lovers of truth. Where darkness prevails and contaminates youth. With spiritual understanding no darkness can spread. Since intelligent production and distribution, will provide us with bread.

When certain business concerns are held up and robbed frequently, it is a fair sign that business is good in their particular lines, but about the only way to be sure when movie actors are really in the money is to find their names in the divorce news.

New Railroad Cutoff Formally Dedicated

Denver Tunnel Puts Denver on Shortest Transcontinental Route.

Bond, Colo.—America's newest, shortest transcontinental railroad route came into being here Saturday. While more than 4,000 persons cheered and shouted, the 38-mile Denver cutoff, built by the Denver & Rio Grande Western railroad was dedicated formally, and the fifty year old dream of Davis Moffett that some day Denver would be on a transcontinental line came true.

Governors of two states, Utah and Colorado, their capitals brought 173 rail miles nearer each other by the cutoff opening, the mayors of Salt Lake City and Denver, and a galaxy of famous railroad men were here to see the cutoff opened.

With hundreds of business men, civic boosters, reporters and others they rode into Bond in the finest rail equipment available. The Burlington Zephyr, holder of the world's non-stop speed record, was there. Three other heavy trains, representing the latest, most luxurious thing in passenger accommodations, made the trip from Denver.

The $18,000,000 tunnel which Dave Moffat built runs beneath James peak. As the trains slipped thru the huge bore, passengers recalled that, many years before, a party of Mormons had toiled along that route, carrying on their backs the dissembled parts of their wagons, to be put together again when the level plains beyond the continental divide was reached.

At 1:30 p. m. the tone of a Rio Grande locomotive bell were sounded. Then into the cutoff, going from east to west, moved a 100 foot mountain locomotive, the finest of heavy type engines, drawing behind a luxurious passenger train. Just behind came the silvery Burlington Zephyr. Last of all, a great freight engine, drawing behind it a long string of freight cars snorted out into the cutoff.
