

Mind Training Urged to Aid Spastic Child

Mental Treatment Called as Important as Body Exercise; Muscular Control Is Important.

SAN FRANCISCO (UP)—Spastic paralysis, muscular disorder which afflicts children, can be cured if given proper treatment at an early age, in the opinion of Dr. Earl Carlson, noted specialist in spastic disorders and member of the Neurological Institute of Columbia University. Mental exercise in treatment of this paralysis, he said, was as important as physical exercise.

Dr. Carlson, in an address here, said: "A sound mind within a crippled body also will become crippled unless adequate channels for expression and recreation are provided."

He explained that he had suffered from the disorder for more than a year during his own childhood. Dr. Carlson's physical coordination was impaired at birth by a brain hemorrhage. He overcame the paralysis, educated himself and now devotes his life to the motor disorders of children.

"In the gradual cure of the spastic sufferer the exercise of the body and mind is important," he said.

Muscular Control Important
Dr. Carlson pointed out that a spastic child, unable to control his muscular movements, is sometimes considered mentally defective.

"In reality," he said, "he may be mentally bright."

"Often the children are laboring under purely motor handicaps," he continued, "with little or no mental disturbance, and have a possibility of extremely good recovery if given proper treatment at an early age."

Dr. Carlson proposed establishment of schools which, in addition to teaching these children suffering from paralysis, muscular coordination, would also enable them to gratify their desire for personal worth by individual development.

The answer to the present problem of hundreds of spastic children in the United States, he believes, rests in proper use of physical and mental training so that the development of the child will be well rounded.

Child Loses Fear
"By compensating for his affliction with the development of the unimpaired areas of the brain," Dr. Carlson said, "the spastic loses his fear, increases manual control and becomes a useful citizen."

Pointing out that there were adequate facilities in all the large cities for careful diagnosis and treatment of the spastic, Dr. Carlson said a cure could not be obtained by prescriptions filled at "the corner drug store."

"A spastic school, with simultaneous physical and mental training, is the only answer," he said.
Dr. Carlson directs the training of thousands of spastics in the Presbyterian Medical center in New York where he puts his theories into practice daily.

MOTHER ADOPTS HER OWN CHILD

OAKLAND, Cal. (UP)—When Mrs. Beulah Morrison of this city went through the rather unusual formality of legally adopting her own daughter, she brought to a happy ending one of the oddest domestic tragedies that resulted from the depression.

Following her divorce from her husband in 1927, when she was awarded the custody of her little daughter, Patricia, all went well for a while until the depression in 1930 made it impossible for her to earn enough to support them both.

Under the circumstances, a married sister and her husband agreed to adopt Patricia and rear her as a member of their own family. The necessary court proceeding accordingly was gone through with which invested in them all legal rights for the custody of the girl.

With the passing of the depression, however, the mother finally obtained a good position as an accountant and in the end was able to establish a home for herself.

The foster parents in the meantime had become devotedly attached to Patricia. But after a family consultation it was decided that Patricia, now 15, should go back to her mother.

To make it legal, however, it was necessary for the mother to bring legal proceedings for the adoption of her own daughter to set aside the validity of the first adoption.

Large Number of Chickens
The Journal field man visited the farm of W. H. Leesley east of Greenwood during the past week and was amazed to find 1,400 chickens that range all the way from a few days old up to 2 pound broilers that are about ready for market.

The care of this large number of chickens keeps Mr. Leesley and the force at the farm busy, as they have to maintain a uniform temperature as well as provide the proper food, which costs considerable money, but is reflected in the top prices that early broilers bring.

Will Leesley, a son of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Leesley, is engaging in the business on a large scale and will soon have upwards of 2,000 young chicks to be brought up to the broiler stage. This requires additional heating equipment and will keep everyone about the farm busy.

Laughing Around the World With IRVIN S. COBB

No Memory for Details

By IRVIN S. COBB

AT SUNDAY school, George, just past his fourth birthday, was making his first appearance. The teacher asked him who had made him and George confessed, his total ignorance on this important point.

"God made you, George," said the teacher, "now remember that, so you can tell me when you come back again next Sunday."
Next Sunday George returned.
"George," said the teacher, "tell me who made you."
George thought a moment.
"I done forgot the gentleman's name," he said.

TRAIL OF DEATH MARKS VOYAGE OF QUEEN BEES

SYDNEY (UP)—Twenty-seven queen bees that arrived here safely from London left a trail of death behind them on the long trek (via steamer).

No fewer than 2,500 drone bees lost their lives in an effort to keep their queens alive until the latter should have completed their journey.

The original shipment of the queen bees totaled 30, but three died en route.

Each queen bee was at all times surrounded by 80 to 100 drone bees whose duty it was to keep the queens alive by feeding and succoring them. Despite the fact that the bees traveled in an air-conditioned cabin, the work of the drone bees was so exhausting that they fell by the hundreds in their efforts to succor their mistresses.

Each queen bee was worth $8, but once they arrived at Australia they were treated just like any other beast bird or animal trying to get into this country.

Each queen was put under an anesthetic and carefully examined under microscope by officials of the Department of agriculture before final decision that the heavy loss of bee life en route had not been in vain.
