Not Oil, but Water—and They Got It

"These Wiesneth boys have a well drilled out that could just about go down to oil," said a farmer from out Weeping Water way when in our office one day recently.

Now, it happens the Journal has been carrying a small ad for the Wiesneth rig, ever since it was published in October, by O. G. (Jack) Wiesneth, who operates a plumbing and well supply business in Louisville, and we checked up on our former friend's statement to find it was very little if any exaggerated.

In fact we were able to get a picture of the outfit and drilling crew on the Peter Anderson farm 2 miles west and a mile north of Weeping Water, where they actually went down 107 1/2 feet, drilling through 75 feet of limestone and flint rock, with hard shale next of the rest of the way. The last 10 feet was in the Muskegan formation that produced an ample supply of blue water which runs 2 1/2 feet in the 6-inch well and maintains its level at 100 feet more than 100 feet from the top.

The crew were at the Anderson place about a month and struck this ample supply of water Sunday, May 8th.

In the picture which appears with this article, the men are, left to right: John Wiesneth, brother of Jack; Peter Anderson, on whose farm the well is located; Joe Novak, one of the drillers, and A. G. (Jack) Wiesneth, Louisville plumber and owner of the rig.

Mr. Wiesneth stopped in Plattsmouth Thursday en route to Omaha to have his ad continued through June and July, and stated he has drilled 15 wells since buying the rig last fall and has several prospects lined up now. The Anderson well was his second in the Weeping Water vicinity where water is difficult to secure except at great depth. Mr. Wiesneth's ad says they are equipped to go down 300 feet, which it says is not so far as it seems in view of the wild cut in well prices. If you want water, Mr. Wiesneth will be glad to figure with you.
