Issues of Campaign.

Secretary Taft referred to the policy likely to characterize the presidential campaign and placed them under two heads, the policy of the McKinley administration and the policies of the former, he said, might be placed under the term expansion, which policies of the former, he said, might be placed under the term expansion, which policies did not cease when President Roosevelt were elected the country would be involved in more wars than ever before, but instead President Roosevelt was instrumental in stopping one of the biggest wars in recent years. He characterized him as one cent years. He characterized him as one of the greatest exponents of peace in the world's history. In discussing railroad measures and the legislation enacted regarding them, Secretary Taft said that if any of the rallroad presidents were interviewed today, down deep in their secret hearts they would say that they were glad of what happened, because they are now
