BEAUTY'S LURE TO DEATH

Strange Life Story of Countess Tarnowski of Vienna.

MADE MEN HER PLIANT SLAVES

Used Them as Tools to Bring Her Immense Wealth and Discarding Them One by One.

VIENNA, Sept. 28.—(Special.)—No more sensational story has ever been told in fiction or acted in melodrama than that which has been unraveled by the Vienna police in solving the mystery of the murder of Count Kamarovsky at Venice a few days ago. Although some details of the crime have doubtless been cabled to America, the story in its entirety is of such dramatic interest that it is well worth telling in full.

It is the story of a beautiful she-devil and the demonic power which her wondrous beauty and powers of fascination enabled her to exercise over men who fell victims to her charms. For the real author of the murder of Count Kamarovsky is the Countess Maria Nikal-yeffna Tarnowski, who, for some time, has been dazzling Vienna with her lovely face and magnificent dresses. The other characters in the tragedy were her puppet-men whom love of her had made her slaves, willing for the chance of winning her to risk the gallows in this world and damnation in the next.

The countess is one of those seductive sirens luring men to destruction that you read about sometimes in novels and never doubt if their counterpart in real life ever exists. She is not yet 30 and time merely ripened her beauty. Her face gives the lie to physiognomy. With her deep, soulful eyes she looks angelic. Her beauty, perhaps, is a heritage from her Irish ancestry, for she is descended from a gallant Irishman named O'Rourke, who settled in Russia 100 years ago.

Married Before Eighteen.

She was not 18 when she married Count Tarnowski, a Russian nobleman of ancient lineage and possessed of large estates. After a few years she tired of her husband and seduced herself with a lover, a friend of his, too, she denounced him in an anonymous letter to the count. The result was, the count challenged him and killed him in a duel. He was the first man to lose his life for the countess. How many more she has been instrumental in sending to an untimely grave nobody knows, for the Vienna police have not yet traced her career in full.

The death of one lover left her free to ensnare others. But Count Tarnowski's eyes were opened at the time. She brought a divorce. The countess was glad enough to be released from her matrimonial fetters. The process brought her another victim. In the divorce proceedings she employed a Moscow lawyer, M. Pritukoff. At that time Pritukoff was making something like $30.00 a year, enjoyed an unblemished reputation and was happy in his domestic relations.

He was her emergency man. He tried to poison himself once, he said, to get rid of his troubles, but the doctors got to work on him with a stomach pump in time to save his life. That he now regards as a misfortune, for if he does not swing for his share in the murder of Count Kamarovsky he will certainly get a long term of penal servitude.

Russian Fell Victim.

Before leaving Russia for gay European fields the countess cast her evil but bewitching spells upon a Russian nobleman, Prince Naumoff. Princes are rather plentiful in Russia and are not necessarily included among the top-notchers of the Russian aristocracy. But the prince had money and that was what counted most with the countess. He tagged after her, too, almost as persistently as Pritukoff, for he was most madly in love with her. His infatuation has cost him $25,000; his wife is suing him for a divorce and that he will be hanged hardly admits of question, for he was the man who actually killed Count Kamarovsky.

In the course of her travels the countess chanced to meet Count Kamarovsky, an old acquaintance, whom she had lost track of for some time, because the count was on the front in the war against Japan and had there been severely wounded. The count had lots of money and the countess wanted money badly, for Prince Naumoff had about exhausted his immediate resources on her account, and Pritukoff had been dead broke for two years or more.

Count Was Easy Conquest. With the countess, of course, the first preliminary to getting hold of a man's money was to make him fall in love with her. She was an adept at that. Count Kamarovsky proved an easy conquest. He had a wife at the time. She brought a suit for divorce against the count, but before the case came up for trial she simplified matters by dying. Then Count Kamarovsky and the Countess Tarnowski became formally engaged.

The count lavished gifts upon her. When she went out driving with him in Vienna she created a sensation by the splendor of her toilets and the magnificence of her jewels. She spent much time with him in Venice, too, where the count had a handsome villa on the Campo Santo Mona del Giglio. But marriage with him formed no part of her plan. It was his wealth she coveted and marriage might prove an obstacle rather than an aid to its complete possession. She got the count to insure his life in her favor for $100,000. Pritukoff selected the company in which it was taken out. The countess told him to make her train by which she ever had any intention of redeeming that pledge is doubtful.

Pritukoff took lessons in shooting and studied other methods of assassination. According to the confession of the countess the plan originally arranged was that Pritukoff should take the train by which the count was to travel from Vienna to Venice, by some pretext get into the compartment which the count would have reserved for himself, engage him in conversation, offer him a narcotized cigarette, and when it had rendered him unconscious, shoot him.

It was a risky scheme, and as the time drew nigh for putting it in execution Pritukoff's nerve failed him. The countess says Pritukoff told her he was afraid that if he actually killed the count she would get to loathe him as a murderer and refuse to marry him. Probably she would not have married him, but it would have been because he had played the role of an assassin. Pritukoff gave her credit for more scruples than she possessed.

But with Pritukoff balking, it became necessary to employ a more daring tool to get the count out of the way. The countess summoned Prince Naumoff to Vienna. The prince was only 25, hot-blooded and impetuous and madly jealous of anyone who stood between him and the countess. He had already sent Count Kamarovsky a letter threatening to kill him if he cut him out. She told the prince that she had intended to go no further than a flirtation with the count, but that his persecution had rendered him detestable to her. She assured the prince that he was the only man she had ever really loved, and offered him the same terms as she had offered Pritukoff and the more venturesome prince eagerly accepted them.

Plot Within a Plot. The wicked siren had not the slightest intention of carrying out her bargain with the prince. Pritukoff was cognizant of the arrangements made with him. The pair set to work on a scheme by which, in the event of the prince's mission of assassination succeeding, they hoped their own safety would be assured.

It was a plot within a plot, by which it was to be made to appear that the countess and Pritukoff had striven to save the count from the vengeance of his jealous rival. The prince was to kill the count at his villa in Venice, journeying from Vienna for that purpose. Pritukoff proceeded him thither with a couple of detectives and posted them about the villa. That would substantiate the story he was to tell—and did tell when first arrested—that the countess had dispatched him to Venice to take precautions to insure Count Kamarovsky's safety, because she had heard the count was to travel from Vienna to Venice. And that he had really threatened the count's life the letter to the count would prove. As to any charge that she was a party to the plot to murder the count, they were to be met—as they were at first—by her indignation and scornful denials. The pair calculated that as they had planned things, it would be impossible to prove, whatever the prince might say, that they had any share in the count's assassination.

Finally Brought to Justice.

It was part of the scheme that the detectives were to capture the prince as he left the villa. That they didn't do, Pritukoff with his two men were actually in front of the count's villa when the prince entered it. But he did not tell the detectives that the prince was going there to shoot the count. That would have prevented the murder and the prevention of the murder would, of course, prevent the countess from getting possession of the count's fortune. That was the first point that caused the police to doubt the genuineness of the story told by the countess and Pritukoff that all their efforts had been aimed at saving the count from the danger that threatened him.

The only order that Pritukoff gave to the detectives was to seize anybody who rushed out of the house. They pounced on a man who ran out to give the alarm and the prince escaped then, only to be arrested by the Italian police later.

The countess lingered for some days after her husband was shot. The countess and Pritukoff were arrested in Vienna just after they had collected the insurance money on the count's life. Their trial and that of the prince will take place in Venice, where the crime was committed.

A LITTLE YACHT'S TRIP AT SEA

To Be Made on the Deck of a Big Schooner to San Juan, Porto Rico.

NEW YORK, Sept. 28.—Boats don't always sail on the water. Here was one about to make quite a sea trip on the deck of another vessel, this boat being a twenty-five foot sloop that was to be transported from this port to San Juan, P. R., on the deck of a big three-masted schooner.

They brought the little sloop—a trim little craft it was, half-decked over for a cabin—alongside the schooner, which was lying at a wharf in South street, and the first thing they did then was to get the mast out of it. That was easy.

They rigged a tackle to the end of the schooner's mainboom and swung that out of the rail and over the sloop lying on the water below alongside. Then they put a strap around the sloop's mast and hooked the fall of the tackle onto it and hoisted the sloop's mast out of its step and up and over the rail and lowered it there on the schooner's deck, all just as easy as could be. Later they stowed this mast in the schooner's hold.

Then they had to get the hull of the sloop aboard somehow, and this didn't look quite so easy, for it was a bulky thing to handle and it might weigh a matter of three or four tons, but really this was simple and easy too.

They got a couple of stout straps around under the yacht's bottom, one from forward and the other from aft, and worked these along under it until they had got them to where its weight would be nicely distributed on them and so that it would hold nicely in them, and then they brought alongside a floating derrick and hooked the fall of the derrick tackle into the straps.

Easy? Why this derrick could lift forty tons just as nice as four, and the yacht was a baby for it. And so they hoisted the trim little sloop up out of the water, and high enough, and swung it in over the schooner's rail and set it down very gently on the schooner's deck. And there they blocked it and made it fast so that it couldn't get away when the big schooner rolled or pitched at sea, and that's all there was to it.

And when they get to Porto Rico another big derrick there will pick it up and put it back just as gently in the water.

HASKELL VISITS ST. LOUIS

Governor-Elect of Oklahoma Says His People Are Prospering in the South.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 28.—Governor-elect Haskell of Oklahoma arrived here today to confer with some St. Louis men regarding several western railroad enterprises in which he is interested. "Everything is quiet in Oklahoma since the election," said Governor Haskell. "We are not anticipating that our constitution will be rejected at Washington, notwithstanding the criticisms of it made by Secretary Taft and others close to President Roosevelt.

"We are prospering down in Oklahoma since the election. Political differences have been laid aside."

French Waterways.

More than $15,000,000 is to be expended by the French government for the construction of a tunnel canal four and a half miles long, seventy feet wide and forty-three feet above the water level to the vaulted roof to connect the port of Marseilles goes directly with the Rhone river. The great width of this tunnel will permit the passing of two barges. The tunnel will be completely lighted by electricity, and among other novel features there will be a small railroad running along its side. This great engineering feat is to be finished in seven or eight years.
