LARGEST OF HUMAN HIVES

Projected Office Building and Railroad Terminal in New York.

WILL HOUSE 10,000 PERSONS

Twenty-Nine Acres of Floor Space, 5,000 Windows and Thirty-Nine Elevators—Some Idea of Material Needed.

Within a year the biggest office building in the world will be completed in New York City. It is now known as the Terminal Building—that gigantic structure in the underground mazes of which will run the great system of subway lines which will connect New Jersey and uptown by means of tunnels under the Hudson.

It will face on Church street, towering twenty-two stories in the air, with a frontage of two city blocks, from Fulton to Cortland street, and Dey street running straight through its center. So huge is this great building that it will have room for 10,000 tenants, or about the population of Geneva, Adrian, Naugatuck or Bath. And it is estimated that 1,000 a minute, or more than 20,000 persons a day, will enter and leave the building—about the population of such great cities as Baltimore, Boston or St. Louis.

It is hard for the human mind to conceive such a structure as the architect has dared to plan. The structural steel necessary weighs 24,000 tons. When completed; it was built when the subway was in course of construction.

Decorative Features.

The building will be a fine example of Italian renaissance architecture. Up to the fourth story it will be of polished granite and Indiana limestone. Above that it will be of brick and terra cotta. The public halls will be of marble, handsomely decorated, and the building will be finished in hardwood throughout.

There will be a complete conduit system within the building to provide for the telegraph, telephone and stock ticker systems, compressed air and vacuum cleaning apparatus.

A special feature of the building will be the largest electric storage battery in the world, composed of thousands of cells. This is to be held as a reserve. In the event of any accident to the electric generating plant. As the building is almost entirely surrounded by wide streets, such as Cortland, Church and Fulton, with Dey street between, it will be one of the lightest office buildings in New York. On the western side are some low office buildings controlled by the owners of the Terminal station, but the Terminal building, for the most part, rises far above these, so that the view towards the river will remain unimpeded.

Nearly every office in the building, if not every one, will have an opening on the outside.

Facilities for Travelers.

The first floor below the sidewalk will be known as the "concourse floor." Here will be the waiting rooms, in which will be found benches, retiring rooms, telegraph stations, telephone booths, flower booths and newspaper kiosks, restaurants, lunch counters, bookstand stands and every other convenience possible in a railway station.

Below the concourse will be the train platform. Passengers will pass down from this floor by means of stairways and elevators to the platform.

Now just suppose what a tenant in this great building may do when the tunnels are open. He can travel on the Pennsylvania railroad from his office to New Orleans or any point in between without going out of doors. Similarly he can go from his office by way of the Long Island railroad to the tip of Montauk point. He can journey to Montreal by the New York Central or to Boston by the New York, New Haven & Hartford and never once stick his nose out of doors, or he has a choice of many routes to Chicago without ever once coming out from under cover.—New York World.

A MODERN NATURE STORY

How a Shrewd Tomcat Fished with His Tail and Lost a Section of His Narrative.

Some years ago the writer numbered among his household a large tortoise-shell male cat whose tail was abnormally long and tipped with dark red brown somewhat the color of red damel. This cat was in the habit of bringing home several times a week during the summer months large jug-e-runs, or bullfrogs (trana clamata), and well knowing a cat's aversion to water, I was determined to find out how the frogs were caught, so following the cat to a stream which ran near our home, I saw him leap to a flat rock in the middle of the stream, squat himself near the edge of the rock, at the same time allowing his tail to hang over the edge and into the water below. Patiently watching for the next move, I noticed that Tom was swishing his tail through the water, and I did not have to wait long for developments, as presently I saw a large green frog snap at the red-tipped tail as only a frog can snap. Tom evidently felt the tug at his tail, and, swinging it around viciously, the frog was soon within striking distance of his hungry jaws, which closed like a vise on Mr. Frog, silencing his croaking forever. Jumping again to shore, Tom, with his quarry, proceeded to the house to feast upon his victim's legs, the only portion of the frog's anatomy that he seemed to relish.

Tom continued to fish in this manner until one day he came home looking very sheepish and with only a portion of his famous red-tipped tail. This took me down to the creek again, and when I drew near I noticed a large pickerel (pike) lying belly up near the surface of the water, but still showing lots of animation. Imagine my surprise when looking closely I observed about two inches of Tom's red-tipped tail protruding from the pickerel's mouth. The pickerel was struggling meanwhile to encompass the tail, but not for long, as there swam silently out from under the roots of a hemlock tree which stood near the bank a large snapping turtle, evidently attracted by the swishing of the pickerel with his cargo of red-tipped tail. Snapping at the red-tipped tail at first evidently did not suit his turtle-hip fancy, and he was soon devouring the unfortunate pickerel, tail and all.

Now, what I would like to know is this: Did the turtle or the pickerel bite Tom's tail off, and how did Tom know that frogs would bite at anything red or bright and not know that a snapping turtle or a pickerel would do the same thing?—New York Sun.

Carlyle's "Americanism."

The accepted manner of defining Americans, either male or female, in the London comic papers or in second rate English novels is to laud their speech plentifully with "calculate" and "guess" and with "well" at the opening of each sentence. This mode of marking, or any other, is in itself totally unimportant, but linguistically it is not without interest, for, while it is purely convention as now used, and has no relation to any American habits of the present day, whether good or bad, it is pleasant to note that the hard worked humorists need not have gone so far afield to find the words necessary for the identification of Americans.

They really had but to turn to the "New Letters" of Thomas Carlyle (vol. I, p. 178), and there read the following sentence: "He has brought you a 'For a Book of Martyrs, which I calculate will go in the parcel today; you will get right good reading out of it, I guess.'—Senator Lodge in Scribner's."

France for Motorists.

In England it is almost impossible to attain speed with safety. The roads twist and turn and the walls and hedgerows prevent the driver's seeing what there is beyond a curve or an average pace of twenty-five miles per hour is fairly good time in England. Speed laws are enforced with severity in England, but if you will try the mettle of your motor, cross the channel. In France the road is yours.—Travel Magazine.
