STEADY FLOW TO NEW LAND

Farmers of Victoria Are Leaving High Priced Holdings.

RUSH ON TO NEW SOUTH WALES

Departure of Kanakas to Islands—Adjacent to Australia has Left Sugar Lands Without Men.

SYDNEY, July 20.—(Special.)—For some months lately there has been a steady outflow of the agricultural population of Victoria. Farmers are giving up their holdings and are seeking new lands and new homes in New South Wales and Queensland. And now these farmers had been settled for years in the best parts of the state, which they are leaving. It is no uncommon thing to read in the newspapers of fifty or sixty departures daily or even more.

Several reasons are assigned for this migration. One is the high price of land in Victoria as compared with that of New South Wales and Queensland, the high valuations put upon the land representing the high rates of taxation for irrigation and other purposes and the fact that most of the best land had been sold by the government so that the young farmers have little chance of securing suitable country for agricultural purposes or for grazing. There is yet another reason, which accounts for many of the departures. Farmers who are now getting along in years have owned farms consisting of some of the best land in the state referred to—they have prospered and have saved money. They can sell their lands and at good prices and they are doing so. They say that they want greater areas of country so that their children may find homes for themselves and for their families.

Land Cheap in New South Wales.

Now the amount they receive for their Victorian properties will enable them to purchase twice as much land in New South Wales as they could buy in Victoria. In both states the purchasing terms are very liberal, and the areas from which a man may select are practically limitless.

WIFE OUT MINING SWINDLES

Federal Government Alone Has the Needed Power.

VIEW OF AN OLD DETECTIVE

Postoffice Authorities Handicapped by Lack of Men to Do the Work—Safer Than Green Goods Game.

The green goods game and the wiretapping game have become a little bit worn out," said an old detective to a Bee reporter. "I just now it's the mining game that the authorities are up against, and you can take it from me that they are up against it good and hard."

The detective has made a reputation for himself working for the United States government and did more to stamp out the green goods game than almost any one else in the business. What he said about the mining game is echoed by almost every one whose business it is to protect the public from the man with the misleading prospectus and a supply of nicely lithographed stock certificates.

To people who have put their money into the hands of the man with the pretty prospectus only to hear no more from it or the mine it may seem a little strange that the authorities, federal and local, have not stepped in and tried to stop the stream of cash that has flowed from the pockets of the people of this country into the hands of some of these unscrupulous mining promoters.

There are several reasons why they haven't. In the first place, according to those who ought to know, there is no running down a fake mining concern selling in one corner of the continent stock in a mine supposed to be in another corner 5,000 miles away. It takes thousands of dollars, months of time and a man specially equipped for this kind of work, a man with brains and ingenuity possessed by few detectives even among those employed by the government.

Another reason is that the laws of the states are at fault in not putting restrictions around the companies they create. In a few cases where such swindlers have been exposed and the swindlers convicted, the punishment has been light as compared with the outlay necessary to secure conviction.

One Case in Point.

Some years ago, before the discoveries in Nevada and elsewhere that have given such an impetus to the promotion of mining companies, legitimate and illegitimate, the government did get after one man who had launched a mining company up in the northwest and was selling stock to the public by the barrel. The company was not only advertising by means in the newspapers of the country, but it was sending all sorts of literature through the mails.

One of the best postoffice inspectors in the employ of the government was at that time stationed in Chicago. He was put on the case and told to find out whether the government had any right to issue a fraud order and arrest the promoters. The mine was in a region almost inaccessible. It took this detective almost one whole year before he had discovered enough evidence upon which to make an arrest. In that time he had traveled hundreds of miles on horseback and on foot, had engaged experts and looked up miners. He finally found that the company had been organized and had sold stock before it had any mine or mining claim and that a few hundred dollars of the proceeds of the sale of stock had afterward gone to secure an option on a claim pronounced to be worthless. That was all there was to the $1,000,000 mining company whose stock had been distributed broadcast. The investigation cost the government $1,500 and the chief promoter got just two years in jail.

Postoffice Inspectors Help.

Now then the postoffice inspectors do step in and a mining company goes up the spout. In nine cases out of ten the investigation preceding this action by the postoffice authorities has taken many months, and by the time the proper evidence is secured much stock has been sold. Not until they hear of the action taken by the inspectors in stopping the mail and arresting the promoters do the people who have bought this stock and parted with their savings wake up to the fact that they have been deceived.

According to the authorities, there probably never was a time when there was so many schemes afoot which would bear government investigation. This is due to the new discoveries of ore in many sections of this country, Canada and Mexico. One reason why more are not investigated, they say, is because there aren't enough inspectors to do the work. All told there are 250 postoffice inspectors scattered over the country. Their work includes running down mail thieves as well as swindlers. In fact, the protection of the mails from thieves is their first duty ordinarily. Protecting them from fraudulent use comes next.

In the large cities there are from six to ten inspectors, but of these not more than two can be assigned to the detection of swindlers.

"Give us twenty good men," said an inspector recently, "and I will guarantee that we will keep some of these stock swindlers on the run. As it is we haven't got enough men, and until the force of inspectors is considerably increased a lot of people who haven't got the sense to investigate a thing thoroughly before they give up their money are bound to get stuck. That is, unless they do more than they do at present to protect themselves."

Government Often Called In.

In a great many cases when complaints are made to the local authorities of savings lost in mining swindles the authorities are forced to turn the matter over to the government inspectors. While the stock, perhaps, has been sold here and the offices of the promoters are here, the mine or the oil well may be in Mexico.

As a general thing district attorneys and police officials haven't any special funds to draw from with which to pay an investigator for such a journey as that. It can be done a little more readily, they say, by the postoffice officials, because they cover the entire country, and by means of postmasters and the local inspectors in places they can reach out much further.

"It's just that which makes the game so good and so much better than the old green goods game," explained the old detective. "Compared to the fake mining game the green goods game was comparatively easy to run down. It rarely meant a trip of more than 500 miles and the average detective, once he got a 'come on,' was generally bright enough to run the swindlers down and get the goods on them. It was the same with the wire tappers. What's been the result? They're now selling mining stock. Now, who's going to tell whether the mine is a fake or whether it isn't? The only one to tell that, unless you get an insider to squeal on his pals, is the man who has actually made a visit to the place where the mine is supposed to be.

"But that isn't all. There are so many technical things about mining that a man has got to study it pretty thoroughly before he's able to tell just what's up when he gets to the place that is mentioned in the prospectus. If he isn't bright he can be fooled as easily there as he can be right here in New York. The thing may be just as much of a swindle as if I got out a prospectus and sold stock in a company that was going to make salt into gold, but if it's 1,000 miles from nowhere it's going to be a good deal harder to prove a swindle than the other, isn't it?"

Something of a Game.

"Of course, the crooks are on to this. Some of the old wire tappers in consequence are behind security companies whose offices would make your eyes swim. It's more of a gentleman's game, you see, than the old one, and about the only persons these fellows are afraid of are the postoffice inspectors. But suppose they've got a claim of some kind out in the mountains in Nevada and suppose they haven't. You can bet they've got somebody out where they say the mine is located keeping watch for anyone nosing around. They will have plenty of time to close up shop, count all the cash and make a good split-up. Is it any wonder that they prefer mining to the other thing?"

As a general thing the man who is fleeced in the mining game doesn't get as much sympathy as the man who gets tapped by the wire tappers. He will find that the authorities will first want to know why he didn't investigate the scheme and its backers more. One of the chief reasons why the mining swindler enjoys such immunity from arrest lies in the fact that the average investment is not more than $100. The majority of the victims live in small places some distance from the man who is selling the stock and have not enough at stake to make them feel like spending much more money to get it back. All this the mining swindler takes into account.

It is likely that an increase in the number of postoffice inspectors will be asked for at the next session of congress to meet this emergency. It is the consensus that only through the postoffice authorities can the matter be dealt with effectively.
