Time Taken from Other Work by the Organizations and Still the Situation is Not Bettered by

This is the election season with the comen's clubs, and many diverse views of the advantages and disadvantages of clubs generally are to be heard wherever club women forgather. A woman who is a popular member of many clubs, in discussing the pros and cons of membership, said to the New York Post: "My conviction at this time is that we have too many clubs; they offer temptations which the ordinary woman cannot resist; I haven't been able to resist them, and most of my friends confess to the same weakness that I have to confess. Just a year ago I promised myself that nothing would induce me to join another club. I was quite worn out by then by club interests and club affairs, yet during that time I have joined two clubs in the face of my resolutions. They are state associations; in both instances I attended a meeting as an invited guest-in one case, the club of my native state. I found some friends I had not seen since girlhood, and in my enthusiasm over my good fortune in renewing old friendships I allowed my name to be presented then and there for membership. Same thing happened at another state meeting; I had lived in that state during my early married life, and here were some friends who had been members of the first club I belonged to n that distant state. I was lost again through sentiment, and have had just that much more club responsibility all this
