"This building stands west of the ham house where the fire started, and there was a good breeze from the east, blowing directly upon it, but only the corner here, as you see, was touched; but on the windward side, there, the fire made its way through a firewall twenty-four inches thick, and destroyed the greater part of that building. There is no accounting for the strange freaks of a fire."

Wind Is Westerly.

The firemen explained the burning of the warehouse by saying the wind was westerly during the first half hour of the fire, but turned easterly early in the evening. When the wall caved in the boiler room lying at the east end on the main floor of the warehouse, several firemen and volunteers were in the room below, besides the engineers. All of them had narrow escapes but none was struck.

The flames are nowhere visible Saturday morning, but smoke was still rising from the deeper part of the ruins. The firemen were directing their energies to preserving the ice plant, if possible, and to tearing down the dangerous and toppling walls. The water was turned on the shaking sections from big nozzles and, where the morter was burned to powder, it cut out
