JUST KIDS—A Bad Excuse.

Grecian Marriage-Gesture.

There are two noted statues of the Venus Genetrix in which the Grecian marriage-gesture is illustrated—one a Roman copy of a Greek original held to represent a celebrated type by Alcamenes, in the Louvre, Paris. The goddess is clad in a very light Ionian tunic, and with raised right arm lifts her himation from behind toward her head, forming the Greek gesture symbolic of marriage. The left hand extends the apple.

The other, an antique marble statue, in the Vatican museum, is held to be an excellent copy of the bronze cult-statue by Arcesilaus which stood in the temple of Venus of the Forum Julium. The figure is fully draped in very thin, clinging drapery; she extends the apple with her left hand, and with the right raises her mantle over the shoulder toward the head—the symbolical marriage-gesture.

Japanese "Maru."

The word "maru" attached to the name of every merchant ship and commonly accepted as meaning "ship" in reality has no known meaning. According to a Japanese authority the word is the survival of a custom centuries old. There are two opinions as to how the custom started. The story, the more likely to be the true one, is that in ancient times the Japanese attached "maru" to the name of anything precious or highly prized, as a sword or a baby. It was first applied to a ship's name about 2,000 years ago, when the Empress Jingo sent an expedition to Korea. She added the word to the name of the ship that transported the troops to Korea. Ever since then "maru" has been associated with the name of a steamship or sailing vessel. It is never used with the name of a warship.
