HOW TO CLEAN YOUR SILKS

Remove Grease Spots by Holding Over Fire; French Chalk and Pressing Recommended.

A good way to get grease spots from silk, writes a correspondent, is to hold the spotted part over a warm fire, not hot enough to burn the silk, but hot enough to melt the grease; put a piece of blotting paper over the spot and then put a warm iron on the blotter.

A good method for cleaning black silk is this: Mix strong coffee and ammonia. Brush the silk thoroughly and then rub the liquid on with a soft cloth. Wind around a board to dry.

French chalk will remove some spots from silk. Rub the chalk thoroughly in the garment and let it stay there for a day or so. Then brush it out with a velvet brush.

Water spots can sometimes be removed by pressing the silk on the wrong side, with a piece of thin muslin between the iron and the silk.

If silk has lost its body and stiffness follow the method of a renovator: Boil an old, clean kid glove in water and sponge the silk with the somewhat sticky liquid resulting.

Whenever silk is pressed a sheet of tissue paper or a piece of thin muslin should be spread over the silk to prevent glazing. The silk should be placed with its right side toward the board, ironed on the wrong side.

If You Want a Straw Hat.

So used have we become to seeing straw hats in midwinter and furs in summer that we think nothing of it when the smart hat shops offer straw and sports things in midwinter as the only things entirely new. A new hat is of rose colored hemp, faced with rose georgette, and attractively embroidered in wool and silk.
