Fall Plowing Best.

Farmers frequently make a mistake by not plowing more of their cultivated fields in the fall than they do. Some are constantly crowded with work and "cannot get around to it," others are somewhat negligent and fail to realize that crops too often give poorer yield from spring than fall plowing.

Deep spring plowing is likely to result in diminished crops, especially if followed by a period of drouth. The loosening of the soil to a great depth admits air and facilitates the loss of soil moisture. It breaks off capillarity and the moisture from lower depths is not readily drawn upon. Consequently, in a dry summer, there will not be enough moisture to support a good crop. The advantage in plowing, particularly loamy soils, in the spring, when the land is still moist, is not merely that the ploughshare slips easlly through the soll, but rather that the furrow-slice, as it dries, falls down on Itself and forms loose earth.

It is evident that fall plowing can not be recommended for all soils and all localities. The plow does not grind the soil to powder, but merely throws it up into little ridges, or furrows, and while in this condition in loosened and torn apart. This is especially true of fine clay solls which run together and of those that pack action upon vegetable and mineral matprevent the business from suffering in them.
