On January 17, 1706, Benjamin Franklin saw the beginning of his long life, which fortunately for the world had other dimensions than that of length. In the young and scrambling village of Boston, where he was born in a house opposite the Old South Street Church, the period of boyhood was shortened by the new country's need of producers rather than consumers. Familiar as the story of George Washington's hatchet is the story of the qualat, precoclous child who at 7 disconraged his father's idea of devoting him to the church, at 10 helped his father in the uncongenial trade of soap boiler and tallow chandler, and at 12 signed an indenture of apprenticeship hinding himself to serve his brother for nine years as printer. In Philadelphia, when he arrived there in 1723, there were but two printers. With one of these, Keimer, Franklin secured employment. Through his work he became acquainted with Sir William Keith, the governor of the province, who promised to aid him, and Franklin prepared to go to England to purchase a press and types. Up to the moment of sailing the governor promised to supply letters of introduction and credit, but the promise was broken. Franklin, a boy of 18, found himself alone in London, where he easily gained employment, and where he remained a year and a half.

After this visit in England he returned to Philadelphia in 1724, established himself in the printing business, published a newspaper, practiced industry and frugality, avoided the appearance of evil, married and gradually rose high in the esteem of his fellow citizens. Through "Poor Richard's Almanac" he preached to the people. He organized societies and clubs; learned French, Spanish and Italian; served as clerk of the provincial general assembly for fourteen years and was then chosen a member of the assembly itself ; was appointed postmaster of Philadelphia; invented the Franklin stove; founded a philosophical society; started the movement for an academy, which eventuated into the University of Pennsylvania; organized the Union Fire Company; helped in the foundation of a hospital; tried to reform the night watch; secured city improve ments; procured horses and wagons to carry the ordnance and camp belongings of General Braddock on his illfated campaign of the French and Indian war, and in every way filled the position of first citizen of the province
