BUILD NESTS OF MUD

SOUTH AMERICAN BIRDS CONSTRUCT STRONG STRUCTURES.

As Small as the Robin, the "Casaras" Demand a Luxurious Home and Have the Ability to Put It Together.

Visitors to Argentina or Uruguay are surprised to see big wads of sun baked mud perched upon trees, rocks, the cross arms of telegraph poles, or fence posts, and still more amazed to learn that these curious masses are the nests of birds not unlike our robins.

When the autumn rains soften the parched earth, pairs of these forehead birds gather beakfuls of the sticky adobe soil, and mold it into a roughly globular form.

The country people like to have the oven birds about their houses, and the birds usually turn the doorway of their nest toward a neighboring house or road.

The advantages of the oven like nest, especially when it has two rooms, are many. It completely conceals the brooding mother and young.

The casaras suffer, however, from one bold and persistent enemy—the martins. These big swallows refuse to breed anywhere except in an oven bird's nest.

The Princess Who died of a Broken Heart

At exactly five o'clock the maid knocked at the door of the Princess Sophia. It was a loud knock, for her highness had warned the girl she would sleep deeply.

"I'll let her sleep till six," she whispered to herself. "Why should a royal princess get up at five? Perhaps I misunderstood the hour."

Then she went below to the kitchen, where the half-dozen poorly paid servants of the impoverished prince of Saxe-Weimar were waiting to tell her the gossip of the household.

The Princess Sophia, it seemed, locked herself in her room every night with a tragedy. The tragedy concerned the ultimate necessity of royal houses—money; and that ultimate luxury of royal princesses—love.

Her Heart Broken. The kitchen gossips added many details about the royal girl whose heart had been broken under the iron discipline of her caste.

Had Royal Mourner. One distinguished mourner followed the body of the young lieutenant to the grave. It was the crown princess of Greece, sister to the Kaiser; and on that occasion royalty was seen to weep in public.

Born to Life of Sorrow. Thus runs the most modern of fairy stories. For the sorrows of the Princess Sophia were as real as her suicide in Heidelberg on September 17, 1913.

Departures from royal dignity have been frequent in the house of Saxe-Weimar for nearly a century, ever since the family became a mere collateral branch of the royal house of Saxony.

Lovers Separated. Sophia was only twenty when she met Edler von Puttitz, a young man whose family was old enough to be allied to the fourth cousin of the grand duke—possibly; but who was as proud as Prince Wilhelm himself.

Princess Sophia of Saxe-Weimar, Who Recently Committed Suicide.

Princess Sophia was whisked off to the Riviera by her parents and the long arm of the Kaiser reached out to assign zu Puttitz to a minor post at the embassy in Athens.

The pair never saw each other again. The betrothal of Sophia to a princely cousin, rich and recently widowed, was announced forthwith.

Years passed in her effort to escape that match—years during which there was a steady flow of love letters between Athens and Heidelberg.

Sophia succeeded in getting the engagement annulled early in 1908, after a personal visit to the grand duke of Saxony and many letters to the Kaiser.

The previous night Edler zu Puttitz had sent a letter of farewell to the Princess Sophia.

One distinguished mourner followed the body of the young lieutenant to the grave. It was the crown princess of Greece, sister to the Kaiser; and on that occasion royalty was seen to weep in public.

Again the ponderous wheels of German statecraft whirred. The Bleichroeder millions would place the troublesome Saxe-Weimar family in a position which the male members would be less likely to desert.

The match was sanctioned by the shrewd Kaiser, pending the consent of the grand duke of Saxony, head of the house.

The Bleichroeder clan, elated and breathless, sent impetuous Hans to New York, where he passed two years in Wall street as an employe of Messrs. Kissel, Kinnicut & Co., international bankers.

A year passed, then two. The young Baron von Bleichroeder returned from foreign parts—and was not received by Prince Wilhelm of Saxe-Weimar.

On September 17 the timid little servant saw through a keyhole the answer of the Princess Sophia to her father, to the grand duke of Saxony and to the hard compulsion of her rank.

She had ended the long struggle with a bullet.

Hans von Bleichroeder still remains in Heidelberg. He has sought an interview with Prince Wilhelm, desiring the return of his love letters.

Prince Wilhelm declines to receive him, refuses even to reply. From the standpoint of the house of Saxe-Weimar there were no love letters.—New York World.

His Choice. Hobbs is a good soul and a clever pianist, but no genius and nobody takes him for one.

Consequently it seemed to his friends a bit out of place for him to decorate his music room by hanging up Wagner's portrait, and as a match to it on the opposite wall one of himself of exactly the same heroic size.

Somebody ventured to call Hobbs' attention as tactfully as possible to this slight error of taste.

Upon the next visit to his quarters it was observed that the hint had borne fruit. Wagner's picture had been removed.—New York Evening Post.
