The only honorable and honest way to stop a newspaper is, to step into the office, pay up all arrearages, get a receipt and have your name off the list. To fire paper marked "refused" back at the editor, when you owe six months or a year, and never go near the office, is not only disreputable but superlatively dishonest as well.

How often do we read of young men trying to make away with other people's property in different ways, and in most cases they are caught and punished. Young man, your desires should be above anything of this kind. If you have no scruples, beware of the law! It takes a smart man to be a successful criminal and a rich one to escape the clutches of the law when caught. It will pay you to make an honest living.

conveniently arranged on this floor, while another space is given to the clerical department, where ample room is provided for the filing of all histories of cases, which is done in the most systematic manner. Small carrier elevators connect the filing department with each of the floors above, which is used for the sending of histories of cases either to the departments above or to the filing room.

On the first floor is the large lobby, which occupies the central portion of the building, about which is a wide corridor or hallway which separates the main room from the consultation and examination offices of the staff. This also is a decided improvement insofar that the doctors cannot be seen leaving their offices and thus be accosted by the patients when passing from one office to another for consultation. The business office, a private office, a stenographer's room, dietetaphone room, postoffice for the staff, telephone operator's office, large vault, as well as the principal office rooms for consultation and examination are on the first floor.

One section of the second floor is given entirely to the eye, ear, nose and throat division, while the bacteriological and other laboratories are also on this floor. A large space is given to the X Ray department, including dressing rooms for patients and splendidly equipped rooms for the development of the plates.

Special attention has been directed to the X Ray department, for upon the X Ray depends much of the successful achievements of surgery and the correct diagnosis. Like the photographer's camera the X Ray cannot lie. This department has been equipped with all the very latest appliances of science, and is conceded to be absolutely complete in its equipment and appointments. Adjoining the X Ray rooms are the developing rooms and the dressing apartments, where patients can prepare themselves for the X Ray exposure.

The south wing of the third floor is given to cozy and comfortable quarters for the staff of about 48 or 50 doctors to study and read, adjoining which is a large room equipped with immense steel racks for the accommodation of the large medical library. On the opposite side of the library is a spacious and magnificently appointed assembly room where the conferences of the staff will be held. Conspicuous in the assembly room on each side of the massive fireplace are the beautiful oil paintings of Drs William J and Charles H Mayo, while on the mantle stands a bust of the late Dr W W Mayo. Another room has been arranged for lounging and smoking. The north wing of the third floor is given to the pathological laboratory.

The fourth floor is given to the museum, photographer studio, rooms for the storing of exposed and unused plates, and a large section fully equipped for an excellent mechanical work shop.

The fifth floor is devoted mainly to research and experimental work and is equipped with the most modern appliances for such a department. On the east of this floor is the large greenhouse, which will supply the flowers and plants for the entire building.

To give a detail description of the different departments, or the appointments of any one section would be impossible to do in a short space, and would be of little interest to the reader, unless there was a full comprehension of the purpose to which such arrangement was made but there are many notable features in the structure which are deserving of mention, and which will give to a small degree a comprehension of the magnitude of the whole plant in general.

The center of attraction and the feature that commands the greatest admiration is the magnificent lobby. Here it is that the artist has displayed the greatest talent. Its soft tones of the decorative effects, its peaceful surroundings, its alluring appointments are conducive to a forgetfulness of one's physical sufferings, calling forth the higher instinct of love for the aesthetic and sublime, giving to the broken in spirit a new vision that dispels gloom and bids him who enters here not all hope to abandon.

Rockwood's artistry, which is a new masterpiece in the art, is need to advance on the wide of this portion of building, and also forms the imposing double staircase that leads to the four floors above. The handwork of the artist is shown in the distinctive and harmonious design. The floor is Rockwood tile. A green color motif is given in the decorative tints, having a soft and soothing effect upon the sense of sight, and the whole is made perfect by the beautiful indirect lighting system.
