The prose-romance came late in their development. The novel and the short story as they knew them for centuries were embodied in the Illad

Whether one poet wrote the Iliad and the Odyssey has been a question that has busied many thousands of minds. The perfect form in which they have come down to us proves clearly that many centuries contributed to the per-fecting of the literary style in which they are written. The discussions over the "Homeric Problem" have inid the basis for literary and biblical criticism in modern scholarship.

THE elders of the Trojans from gate looked down upon the hosts of Greeks and Trojans marabout?

Homer sings of the wrath Achilles, but the beginning of all the trouble goes back of that, to the tale of a princely shepherd on a night surprised as he watched his flocks upon Mount Ida. The goddesses Hera, the judgment of Paris is for a fair are worked up to with consummate ar-Paris brings Queen Helen and great friend, begs his chief to let him don treasure. A hue and cry follow his lord's armor and save his people: genial Nestor, and all the chivalry of war on Troy.

Others must pay for the wrongdoing of Paris-old King Priam of the Ashen Spear, his venerable queen. Hecuba, Hector and his noble wife Andromache, his little son Astyanax, Cassandra and all the rest whom the toll of war involves. Other stories of the many Greek epics, now lost, bring the tale of warring years up to the tenth, where the Iliad begins. Hector is the leader of the Trojans; Achilles has been the great fighting force of the Greeks, though now he has withdrawn in anger to his tent because of a slight put upon his honor by King Agamemnon.

The hostile forces are advancing to the battle; a dramatic moment brings Menelaus and Paris in sight of one another. The wrath of Hector blazes out against Paris for all the evil and shame his theft of women and wealth have brought. The gay and debonair Paris, however, can show splendid moments. "Hector, thy taunt is just. But throw not at me the lovely gifts of golden Aphrodite. The glorious gifts that the gods give are not to be flung away; no man could take them by mere willingness. But if thou doest wish me to battle and fight, make all the rest of the Trojans and Achaians sit down, and put me in the midst with warlike Menelaus to fight for Helen and all her goods, to see who shall conquer and prove the better man; let the rest conclude a friendship of trusty oaths; may ye dwell in fertile Troyland, and the others go back to Argos, nurse of steeds, and Achaia of fair women."

So it was that the hosts sat in high expectation in the plain, and Priam and the Trojan elders were gathered on the Schean gate. And Priam, who bore no grudge against Helen for all the misery her fair face had brought to him and Troy-for he saw the hands of the gods in it all-called her to his side to tell him of the chiefs among whom she had once lived. Then those elders, who had long since seen their fighting days, paid the finest compliment a woman's beauty has ever received-how many thousand years ago? as they saw Helen advancing. "No cause for anger that Trojans and well-greaved Achalans for such a woman long time should suffer sorrow." Not another word! But those old men upon the wall have drawn for you and me a picture of The World's Desire. "But even so," they continued, "let her go home upon the ships and stay not as a source of sorrow to us and to our children after The high hopes of settling all the

The scene changes to Troy itself. In an interval of the battle great Hector of the Glancing Helm had gone to the citadel. And there he said farewell to Andromache, his wife, and to his little boy, a picture that has never been surpassed for true tendernessalthough it was so many hundred years ago. He smiled and looked upon the little boy in silence. "Ah, Hector," she cried, "stay here upon the wall! Thou art to me father and mother and brother, too, as well as lord. The foe will attack thee alone!" "I know the day shall come," he answered, "when holy Ilios shall perish, and It is the charm of the stories of Priam and the folk of Priam of the goodly Ashen Spear. And as he comes back from battle may many a man say of him, 'A far better man than his father,' and may his mother rejoice in heart." And then he handed him back to his mother, who received him smiling through her tears, and so departed to the battle with words of high cheer.

There follow many scenes of varied action—the Iliad is one of the great collections of short stories in the world's literature, in which is given a perfect picture of the life of that lordly society of so long ago. The plain people play little part, although their champion, Thersites, is the first democrat mentioned in litertheir seats upon the Scaean ature. And in the end, even Achilles' heart is moved. For old King Priam can neither sleep nor eat while his son's body lies dead in the camp of the foe. Against the will of all that was dearest to him he gathered great store of ransom and made his way by night under the kindly guidance of the gods to Achilles' tent and sought for the body of his dear son. It is a scene of love and pity, of chivalry and greatness of heart that all the years since then have never seen surpassed. Be not angry with me, Patroclus," prayed Achilles, "if thou shalt learn in Hades' house that I have given back noble Hector to his dear father." And Patroclus, one may be sure, shared the pity of all brave men and all true women ever since.

Monarch Endured Long.

The most curious contract ever entered into by an operatic star was surely that of Farinelli, who, about the year 1734, was deriving an income of £5,000 per annum. The singer afterwards visited Spain, where the king, Philip V, was suffering from mental depression, from which nothing aroused him until the advent of Farinelli. The queen was so delighted to see her royal spouse once more interested in anything, that she engaged Farinelli at a salary of £2,000 to remain in Madrid. This he did, singing the same four songs to the king every night for ten years. Eventually Phillip succumbed, but he must have been a patient monarch.

LEADING MEN JOIN CAMPAIGN

Organization Work Going on Under Direction of Capt. W. H. Stayton.

Washington.-Having rolled up in two years a membership of more than 200,000, representing every state in the union and the territorial possessions of the United States, Capt. Willlam H. Stayton, fonder of the Assoctation Against the Prohibition Amendment, is now in the middle west, and on October 4 will arrive in Chicago, having completed state organizations in Ohio, Minnesota, Indiana, Iowa and Missouri. There are now active, as are numerous state branches in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware and Texas.

Capt. Stayton was formerly executive secretary of the navy league. In August, 1919, he began the campaign against national prohibition laws and for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. He endeavored to enlist as officers and directors several of the leading men of the country, and finding them at that time reluctant to identify themselves with the movement, he decided to carry the association through the experimental stages. turning it over when success should be assured to the aforesaid prominent persons. He is about to call a convention of members and delegates from the various states, at which permanent officers will be elected and a constructive program formulated.

The association is working:

"To get the Volstead act repealed. "To permit every state (under the concurrent clause) to pass its own enforcement act.

"To then remove the prohibition amendment from the constitution."

Members are requested, under normal conditions, to favor those legislative and congressional candidates who openly stand for the repeal of the Volstead law, and who favor states' rights as to prohibition.

The national headquarters of the association has outgrown its first home here and now occupies two floors of a downtown office building. The office workers are paid, but not the officers, of whom there are two, Capt. Stayton, who has the title of managing vice president, and G. C. Hinckley, secretary and treasurer. Dues are
