He Was Good Enough.

Francis B. Lee of Trenton, famous throughout New Jersey as a lawyer and historian, tells a good story of a darky baptism that it was once his pleasure to witness on the banks of the Delaware.

The pastor, who had taken part in several similar experiences, waded bravely out to the requisite depth, but water evidently was not to the liking of the candidate, for he went hence to have his sins washed away with knocking knees and trembling feet. In trying to get him in proper position the pastor in some way missed his hold, and the candidate, caught in the fast-flowing tide, was carried into the channel. He was a good swimmer, however, and, after making a few sportive splashes, headed for the shore and soon landed dripping on the bank.

The pastor, waist deep in the drink, watched the scene to a finish, and then, raising his hands in a supplicating sort of a way, announced:

"Bruddahs an' sistern, dis yeah baptism an' adjourned. Any man dat can swim like dat Ebenezer Jones hain't gwine to hab any trouble in gettin' over to de uddah side ob de ribah Jordan."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Baths of Ancient Times.

"Did the middle age bathe?" said an antiquary. "Is it true that in medieval times bathing was unknown, that for 1,000 years in Europe there was not a man or woman who ever took a bath?"

"No," said the old man vehemently. "No, thank heaven, this is not true. Man was fairly clean in the middle ages. It is a libel to say he did not bathe. For I have looked this matter up and I find literary records of medieval baths. Thus, in the accounts of Queen Isabella, wife of Edward II, there is a charge for 'repairs of queen's bath and gathering herbs for it.'"

"On the arrival in London of Louis of Bruges in 1473 the chroniclers say that 'there was ordered a bayne, or bath, which was covered with tentes of white cloth.'"

"I have found over six recorded instances of medieval bathing. Baths, I will admit, were in medieval days somewhat rare, but they were not so uncommon, so unknown, as certain historians would have us believe. One bath a month was the average among the aristocracy."
